Quare obstruxit, a writ which lay for him who, having a liberty to pass through his neighbor's ground, could not enjoy his right, because the owner had obstructed it.—Fleta, l. 4, c. xxvi.

Quarentena terræ, a furlong.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Quarrel, a dispute, contest; also, an action real or personal.

Quart, the fourth part of a gallon.

Quarter, a length of four inches.

Quarter-days, the days which begin the four quarters of the year, viz. the 25th of March, or Lady-day; the 24th of June, or Midsummer-day; the 29th of September, or Michaelmas-day; and the 25th of December, or Christmas-day.

Quarterization, dividing a criminal into four quarters.

Quarter-seal, the seal kept by the director of the Chancery in Scotland. It is in the shape and impression of the fourth part of the great seal; and is in the Scotch statutes called the Testimonial of the Great Seal. Gifts of lands from the Crown pass this seal in certain cases. Bell.

Quarter-sessions. See GENERAL QUARTER-SESSIONS, and BOROUGH-SESSIONS.

Quarter of a year, ninety-one days.—Co. Litt. 135 b.

Quarto die post, the fourth day inclusive after a return of a writ, and if a defendant appeared then it was sufficient; but this practice is now altered.

Quash [cassum facere, Lat.], to overthrow or annul.—Bracton. As to quash an indictment, an order of justices, or a poor-rate.

Quasi-contract, an act which has not the strict form of a contract, but yet has the force of it; an implied contract.

Quasi-crime, or Quasi-delict, the action of one doing damage or evil involuntarily.

Quasi-entail. An estate pur autre vie may be granted, not only to a man and his heirs, but to a man and the heirs of his body, which is termed a quasi entail; the interest so granted not being properly an estate-tail (for the Statute De Donis applies only to where the subject of the entail is an estate of inheritance), but yet so far in the nature of an estate-tail, that it will go to the heir of the body as special occupant during the life of cestui que vie, in the same manner as an estate of inheritance would descend, if limited to the grantee and the heirs of his body. And such estate may be also granted with a remainder thereon during the life of cestui que vie; and the alienation of the quasi-tenant-in-tail will bar not only his issue, but those in remainder. The alienation, however, for that purpose (unlike that of an estate-tail, properly so called), may be effected by any method of conveyance, except a will.—1 Step. Com. 448.

Quasi-fee, an estate gained by wrong; for wrong is unlimited and uncontained within rules.

Quasi-personalty, things which are movable in point of law, though fixed to things-real, either actually, as emblements (fructus industriales), fixtures, &c.; or fictitiously, as chattels-real, leases for years, &c.

Quasi-realty, things which are fixed in contemplation of law to realty, but movable in themselves, as heir-looms (or limbs of the inheritance), title-deeds, court-rolls, &c.

Quasi-tenant at sufferance, an under-tenant who is in possession at the determination of an original lease, and is permitted by the reversioner to hold over.

Quasi-traditio, the placing a person in possession of a right.

Quasi-trustee, a person who reaps a benefit from a breach of trust, and so becomes answerable as a trustee.—Lewin's Trusts, 846.

Quatuorviri, magistrates who had the care and inspection of roads among the Romans.—Civ. Law.

Quays. As to erection of quays in or near to a public harbour, or river communicating therewith, see 46 Geo. III. c. 153, amended by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 69, s. 15.

Quebec. See 15 & 15 Vict. c. 53.

Queen [fr. cwen, Sax., a wife], a woman who is sovereign of a kingdom. The queen regent, regnant, or sovereign, is she who holds the Crown in her own right, as Queen Victoria, who has the same powers, prerogatives, rights, dignities, and duties as if she had been a king.

(1) With regard to the Queen's title, the Crown of England, by the positive constitution of the kingdom, has ever been descendible, and so continues, and it is descendible in a course peculiar to itself, yet subject to limitation by Parliament; but notwithstanding those limitations, the Crown retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the prince to whom it is limited.

(2) Her duties are to govern the people according to law, to execute judgment in mercy, and to maintain the established religion.

(3) Her prerogatives are—

(a) As to her dignity or royal character, which consists in the legal attributes of—

(α) Personal sovereignty.
(γ) Political perpetuity.

(b) As to her regal power, in which consists the executive part of government; in foreign concerns, the Queen, as the representative of the nation, has the right or prerogative of—

(α) Sending and receiving ambassadors.
(β) Making treaties.
(γ) Proclaiming war or peace.
(δ) Issuing reprisals.
(ε) Granting safe conducts.

In domestic affairs, the Queen is a constituent part of the supreme legislative power; she may negative all new laws; and is bound by no statute unless specially named therein. She is also considered as the general of the kingdom, and may raise fleets and armies, build forts, appoint havens, erect beacons, prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition, and confine her subjects within the realm, or recall them from foreign parts. She is also the fountain of justice and general conservator of the peace, and therefore may erect courts (wherein she has a legal ubiquity), prosecute offenders, pardon crimes, and issue proclamations. She is likewise the fountain of honor, office, and privilege. She is also the arbiter of domestic commerce; but not of foreign, which is regulated by the law of merchants. She is, therefore, entitled to the erection of public marts, the regulation of weights and measures, and the coinage or legitimation of money. The Queen is also the supreme head of the church, and as such, convenes, regulates, and dissolves synods, nominates bishops, and receives appeals in all ecclesiastical causes.

(4) The Queen's revenue is either ordinary or extraordinary.

(A.) The ordinary is either—

(1) Ecclesiastical, consisting in

(α) The custody of the temporalities of vacant bishoprics.
(β) Corodies and pensions.
(γ) Extra-parochial tithes.
(δ) The first-fruits and tenths of benefices.

(2) Temporal, consisting in

(α) The demesne lands of the Crown.
(β) The hereditary excise; being part of the consideration for the purchase of the feodal profits, and the prerogatives of purveyance and pre-emption.
(γ) Forests.
(δ) Courts of justice.
(ε) Royal fish.
(ζ) Wrecks and things jetsam, flotsam, and ligan.
(η) Royal mines.
(θ) Treasure trove.
(ι) Waifs.
(κ) Estrays.
(λ) Forfeitures for offences.
(μ) Escheats.
(ν) The custody of idiots and lunatics.

(B.) Extraordinary, which consists in aids, subsidies, and supplies granted to her by the Commons in Parliament, and raised by taxation. 1 Bl. Com. 190.

Queen, Shooting at, a high misdemeanor. See SHOOTING AT THE QUEEN.

Queen Anne's Bounty. See BOUNTY OF QUEEN ANNE.

Queen Consort, the wife of the reigning king. She is a public person, exempt and distinct from the king, for she is of ability to purchase lands, and to convey them, to make leases, to grant copyholds, and to do other acts of ownership, without the concurrence of her husband. She is also capable of taking a grant at common-law from her husband, which no other wife can do. She has separate courts and offices distinct from the king's, not only in matters of ceremony, but even of law; and her attorney and solicitor-general are entitled to a place within the bar of his Majesty's courts, together with the king's counsel. She may likewise be sued, and sue alone, without joining her husband; she is indeed considered as a feme sole, and not as a feme covert. She pays no toll, nor is she liable to any fine in any court. As to the security of her life and person, she is placed on the same footing with the king.

Queen Dowager, the widow of a deceased king. She enjoys most of the privileges belonging to her as queen consort. But it is not treason to conspire her death or violate her chastity, because the succession to the Crown is not thereby endangered. No man can marry her without special license from the Crown, on pain of forfeiting his lands and goods. If she marry a subject, she does not lose her regal dignity, as dowager peeresses (if commoners by birth) do their peerages, when they marry commoners.

Queen Gold, a royal revenue which belonged to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and was due from every person who had made a voluntary offer or fine to the king amounting to ten marks or upwards, or in consideration of any privileges, grants, licenses, pardons, or other matters of royal favor conferred upon him by the king; it was due in the proportion of one-tenth part more, over and above the entire offering or fine made to the king, and became an actual debt of record to the queen's majesty, by the mere recording of the fine. But no such payment was due for any aids or subsidies granted to the king in Parliament or convocation; nor for fines imposed by courts on offenders against their will, nor for voluntary presents to the king, without any consideration-money from him to the subject, nor for any sale or contract whereby the revenues and possessions of the Crown were granted away or diminished. It is now quite obsolete.

Queen Regnant, or Regent, she who holds the Crown in her own right. See QUEEN.

As to the status, &c. of the husband of the Queen Regnant, see PRINCE CONSORT.

Queen's Advocate. See ADVOCATE, QUEEN'S. Also an officer in Scotland, similar, but in some respects superior to the Queen's attorney-general in England. It is his province to prosecute all criminal actions, and bring the criminals to punishment, without the intervention of any grand jury, and at the public expense.

Queen's Bench. The Court of King's, or Queen's Bench (so called because the king used formerly to sit there in person, the style of the court still being coram ipso rege, or coram ipsâ reginâ) is a court of record, and the supreme court of common law in the kingdom, consisting of a chief justice and four puisné justices who are by their office the sovereign conservators of the peace and supreme coroners of the land. Yet though the king himself used to sit in this court, and still is supposed so to do, he did not, neither by law is he empowered to, determine any cause or motion but by the mouth of his judges to whom he hath committed his whole judicial authority.

This court, which is the remnant of the aula regia, is not, nor can be from the very nature and constitution of it, fixed to any certain place, but may follow the king's person wherever he goes, for which reason all process issuing out of this court in the king's name is returnable 'ubicunque fuerimus in Angliâ.' It hath indeed for some centuries past usually sat at Westminster, being an ancient palace of the Crown, but might remove with the king to York or Exeter if he thought proper to command it. And we find that after Edward I. had conquered Scotland it actually sat at Roxburgh; and this movable quality, as well as its dignity and power, are fully expressed by Bracton where he says that the justices of this court are capitales generales perpetui et majores; a latere regis residentes; qui omnium aliorum corrigere tenentur injurias et errores. And it is moreover especially provided in the articuli super cartas that the king's chancellor and the justices of his bench shall follow him, so that he may have at all times near unto him some that be learned in the laws.

The jurisdiction of this court is very high and transcendent. It keeps all inferior jurisdictions within the bounds of their authority, and may, either by writ of certiorari, remove their proceedings to be determined here, or, by writ of prohibition, prohibit their progress below. It superintends all civil corporations in the kingdom (See QUO WARRANTO). By writ of mandamus it commands magistrates to do what their duty requires in every case where there is no other specific remedy. By writ of habeas corpus it protects the liberty of the subject by speedy and summary interposition. It takes cognizance both of criminal and civil causes; the former in what is called the crown side or crown office; the latter in the plea side of the court. On the crown side it takes cognizance of all criminal causes from high treason down to the most trivial misdemeanor or breach of the peace. Into it also indictments from all inferior courts may be removed by writ of certiorari, and may be tried either at bar, or at nisi prius, or in some extreme cases at the Central Criminal Court under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16. See CERTIORARI, HABEAS CORPUS, MANDAMUS, QUO WARRANTO.

On the plea side it exercises a general jurisdiction over all actions between subject and subject with the exception of real actions and suits concerning the revenue. Its jurisdiction in civil actions was formerly limited to trespass or injuries said to have been committed vi et armis, but by means of fictitious proceedings called Bill of Middlesex and Latitat (which see) it usurped jurisdiction over all personal actions. It now exercises a direct jurisdiction in all such actions by virtue of 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, which abolished these fictitious proceedings. Error lies from this court to the Exchequer chamber.

The matters comprised within the civil jurisdiction of this court have been thus classed—

(I.) Formal or plenary.

(1) Personal actions.

(2) Mixed action of ejectment.

(II.) Summary.

(1) Annuities and mortgages (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 219 & 220).

(2) Arbitrations and awards.

(3) Habeas Corpus Act (31 Car. II. c. 2, extended by 56 Geo. III. c. 100).

(4) Interpleader Act (1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 58).

(5) Over officers of the court.

(6) Warrants of attorney, cognovits, and judges' orders for judgment.

(III.) Auxiliary.

(1) Answering a special case.

(2) Enforcing judgments of inferior courts of record.

(3) Prerogative Mandamus to compel inferior courts or officers to act. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 75–77.

(4) Prohibition.

(5) Quo warranto.

(6) Trying an issue in fact from a court of equity, or a feigned issue.

(IV.) Appellate.

(1) Appeal from the decisions of justices of the peace, in giving possession of deserted premises to landlords, under 11 Geo. II. c. 19, ss. 16, 17.

(2) Writs of error from certain inferior courts of record (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 102).

(3) Writs of false judgment from inferior courts, not of record, but proceeding according to the course of the common law.

(4) Appeals by way of a case from the summary jurisdiction of justices of the peace, on questions of law (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, Order of Court, 25th November, 1857).

Connected with the Court of Queen's Bench, and auxiliary thereto, is the practice Court, presided over by one of the puisné judges in rotation. The Practice Court (formerly called the Bail Court) hears and determines common matters of business, and ordinary motions for writs of mandamus, prohibition, &c.

Queen's Coroner and Attorney, an officer on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 20. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 54, the office of assistant master of the Crown office is abolished; and the officers on the Crown side of the court are to be the Queen's coroner and attorney and one master.

Queen's Counsel, barristers who have been called within the bar, and selected to be the Queen's counsel. They answer in some measure to the advocates of the revenue, advocati fisci, among the Romans. They must not be employed against the Crown without special license, which, however, is never refused. It costs about nine pounds.

Queen's Evidence, an accomplice to whom a hope is held out, that if he will fairly disclose the whole truth as a witness on the trial, and bring the other offenders to justice, he shall himself escape punishment.—1 Phil. Evid. 31. A jury may, if they think fit, convict on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice.

Queensland, a separate colony, in the district of Moreton Bay, New South Wales. See Gaz. June 3rd, 1849, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 44.

Queen's Printer has the liberty of printing the Bible, Prayer-book, statutes and acts of state, to the exclusion of all other presses, except the two Universities.

Queen's Prison, a jail appropriated to the debtors and criminals confined under process or by authority of the superior courts at Westminster, the High Court of Admiralty, and also to persons imprisoned under the bankrupt-law. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 7, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 60, consolidated the Queen's Bench, Fleet and Marshalsea Prisons. See The Queen's Prison Discontinuance Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 104.

Que estate [quorum statum, Lat.], as much as to say, whose estate he has. It is a plea where one entitling another to land, says, that he and they whose estate he has, have enjoyed the same. A person cannot prescribe in anything by a que estate that lies in grant, and cannot pass without deed or fine; but in him and his ancestors he may, because he comes in by descent without any conveyance.—1 Inst. 121; 2 Bl. Com. 266. See PRESCRIPTION.

Que est le mesme [quæ est eadem, Lat.], a term used in actions of trespass, &c. for a direct justification of the very act complained of by the plaintiff as a wrong. See QUÆ EST EADEM.

Quemadmodum ad quæstionem facti non respondent judices, ita, ad quæstionem juris non respondent juratores.—Co. Litt. 295.—(In the same manner that judges do not answer to questions of fact, so jurors do not answer to questions of law.)

Quem redditum reddit, an old writ which lay where a rent-charge, or other rent which was not rent-service, was granted by fine, holding of the grantor. If the tenant would not attorn, then the grantee might have had this writ.—O. N. B. 126.

Querela, an action or declaration preferred in any court of justice.

Querela coram rege a concilio discutienda et terminanda, a writ by which one is called to justify a complaint of a trespass made to the king himself, before the king and his council.

Querele, a complaint to a court.

Querent [fr. querens, Lat.], a plaintiff, complainant, inquirer.

Quest, inquest, inquisition, or inquiry.

Question, interrogatory; anything inquired. See TORTURE.

Questman, or Questmonger, starter of lawsuits or prosecutions; also a person chosen to inquire into abuses, especially such as relate to weights and measures; also a churchwarden. See Prid. Churchwarden's Guide.

Questus, land which does not descend by hereditary right, but is acquired by one's own labor and industry.

Questus est nobis, a writ of nuisance, which by 15 Edw. I. lay against him to whom a house or other thing that caused a nuisance, descended or was alienated; whereas, before that statute the action lay only against him who first levied or caused the nuisance, to the damage of his neighbour.

Qui abjurat regnum amittit regnum sed non regem; patriam sed non patrem patriæ.—7 Co. 9.—(He who abjures the realm, leaves the realm, but not the king; the country, but not the father of the country.)

Qui accusat integræ famæ sit et non criminosus.—3 Inst. 26.—(Let him who accuses be of clear fame, and not criminal.)

Qui adimit medium, dirimit finem.—Co. Litt. 161.—(He who takes away the middle destroys the end.)

Qui aliquid statuerit parte inaudita altera, æquum licet dixerit, haud æquum fecerit.—6 Co. 52.—(He who decides anything, one party being unheard, though he should decide right, does wrong.)

Quia Emptores, Statute of, 18 Edw. I. st. 1, c. 1, A. D. 1290, West. the third. It is entitled in the parliament-roll, from the subject of it, statutum regis de terris vendendis et emendis. Prior to this statute, any person might, by a grant of land, have created a tenure as of his person; but if no such tenure were reserved, the feoffee held of the feoffor, by the same services by which the feoffor held of his superior lord. The consequence was, that all the fruits of tenure fell into the hands of the feoffors or mesne lords, to the prejudice of the superior lords of the fee; for remedy whereof it was by this statute enacted, 'That thenceforth it shall be lawful to every freeman to sell at his own pleasure his lands and tenements, or part of them, so that the feoffee shall hold the same lands or tenements of the chief lord of the same fee, by such service and customs as his feoffor held before.'—2 Inst. 500; 2 Reeves, c. xi., p. 223.

Quia Timet Bill. It is filed for the purpose of quieting a present apprehension of a probable or possible future injury to property. The court adapts its relief so as to accomplish the ends of the precautionary justice required, and will either appoint a receiver to receive the rents or other income, or order the fund to be paid into court, or direct security to be given for its due preservation and appropriation, or issue its preventive writ of injunction.—Sto. Eq. Jur. c. xxi. and 1 Madd. Chan. 294.

Qui bene distinguit, bene docet.—2 Inst. 470. (He who distinguishes well, teaches well.)

Qui bene interrogat, bene docet.—3 Buls. 227. (He who questions well, learns well.)

Quick with child. See ABORTION.

Qui concedit aliquid, concedere videtur et id sine quo concessio est irrita, sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit.—11 Co. 52.—(He who concedes anything is considered as conceding that without which his concession would be idle, without which the thing itself could not exist.)

Qui contemnit præceptum, contemnit præcipientem.—12 Co. 96.—(He who contemns the precept, contemns the person giving it.)

Quicquid est contra normam recti est injuria. 9 Buls. 313.—(Whatever is against the rule of right, is an injury.)

Quicquid in excessu actum est lege prohibetur. 2 Inst. 107.—(Whatever is done in excess is prohibited in law.)

Quicquid judicis auctoritati subjicitur novitati non subjicitur.—4 Inst. 66.—(Whatever is subject to the authority of the judge, is not subject to novelty.)

Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit.—Off. of Exec. 57.—(Whatever is affixed to the soil, belongs to the soil.)

Quicquid solvitur, solvitur secundum modum solventis.—2 Vern. 606.—(Whatever is paid, is paid according to the direction of the payer.)

Qui cum alio contrahit, vel est, vel esse debet, non ignarus conditionis ejus.—(He who contracts with another, either is, or ought to be, acquainted with the condition of the person with whom he contracts.)

This rule, however reasonable in its application to the condition of a person as fixed by the law of the country where he is domiciled, is not so clear in point of convenience or equity, when applied to the condition of a person as fixed by the law of a foreign country. How are the inhabitants of any country to ascertain the condition of a stranger dwelling among them, as fixed by the law of a foreign country, where he was born, or has acquired a domicile? Even courts of justice do not assume to know what the laws of a foreign country are; but require them to be proved; how then shall private persons be presumed to have better means of knowledge? On the other hand, it may be said with great force, that contracts ought to be governed by the law of the country where they are made, as to the competence of the parties to make them, and as to their validity; because the parties may well be presumed to contract with reference to the laws of the place where the contract is made, and is to be executed. Such a rule has certainty and simplicity in its application. It ought not, therefore, to be matter of surprise that the country of the party's birth should hold such a contract valid or void, according to its own law; and that, nevertheless, the country where it is to be made and to be executed, should hold it valid or void, according to its own law. It has well been observed by an eminent judge (Lord Stowell), that 'with respect to any ignorance arising from foreign birth and education, it is an indispensable rule of law, as exercised in all civilised countries, that a man who contracts in a country engages for a competent knowledge of the law of contracts of that country. If he rashly presume to contract without such knowledge, he must take the inconveniences resulting from such ignorance upon himself, and not attempt to throw them upon the other party who has engaged under a proper knowledge and sense of the obligation which the law would impose upon him by virtue of that engagement.' Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Cons. R. 61; Story's Confl. of Laws, 93.

Quicunque habet jurisdictionem ordinariam est illius loci ordinarius.—Co. Litt 344.—(Whoever has an ordinary jurisdiction, is ordinary of that place.)

Quicunque jussu judicis aliquid fecerit non videtur dolo malo fecisse, quia parere necesse est. 10 Co. 71.—(Whoever does anything by the command of a judge, is not reckoned to have done it with an evil intent, because it is necessary to obey.)

Qui destruit medium destruit finem.—10 Co. 51.—(He who destroys the middle, destroys the end.)

Qui doit inheriter al père doit inheriter al fitz. (He who would have been heir to the father, shall be heir to the son.)

Quid juris clamat, a judicial writ issued out of the record of a fine, which remained with the custos brevium of the Common Pleas before it was engrossed; it lay for the grantee of a reversion or remainder, when the particular tenant would not attorn.—Reg. Jud. 571.

Quid pro quo (what for what), the mutual consideration and performance of both parties to a contract.

Quid sit jus, et in quo consistit injuria, legis est definire.—Co. Litt. 158 b.—(What right is, and what injury is, it is the business of the law to declare.)

Qui eorum vestigia insistant eorum exitus perhorrescant.—4 Inst. 487.—(Let those dread their fate who tread in their steps.)

Quietare, to quit, acquit, discharge, or save harmless.

Quiete clamare, to quit claim, or renounce all pretensions of right and title.—Bract. l. 5.

Quiet enjoyment. See COVENANT and DEMISE.

Quietus, freed or acquitted. A word made use of in the Exchequer in the discharge given to accountants to the Crown, e. g. a sheriff. As to the registration of a quietus, see 2 Vict. c. 11, s. 9.

Quietus reditus, a quit-rent.

Qui evertit causam evertit causatum futurum. 10 Co. 51.—(He who overthrows the cause, overthrows the future consequence.)

Qui ex damnato coitu nascuntur inter liberos non computentur.—Co. Litt. 8.—(Those who are born of unlawful intercourse, are not counted among children.)

Qui facit per alium, facit per se.—Co. Litt. 258.—(He who acts through another, acts through himself.)

Qui habet jurisdictionem absolvendi, habet jurisdictionem ligandi.—12 Co. 59.—(He who has the jurisdiction of loosening, has the jurisdiction of binding.)

Qui hæret in literâ, hæret in cortice.—Co. Litt. 289.—(He who sticks to the letter, sticks to the bark.)

Qui improvide, a supersedeas granted where a writ is erroneously sued out or misawarded.

Qui in utero est, pro jam nato habetur, quoties de ejus commodo quæritur.—(He who is in the womb is held as already born, whenever a question arises for his benefit.)

Qui jure suo utitur, nemini facit injuriam.—Reg. Jur. Civ.—(He who exercises a right, does an injury to nobody.)

Quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto.—2 Inst. 183.—(Every man can renounce a right introduced for himself.)

Qui molitur insidias in patriam id facit quod insanus nauta perforans navem in quâ vehitur. 3 Inst. 36.—(He who plots against his country acts like an insane sailor who scuttles the ship in which he is carried.)

Qui non cadunt in constantem virum vani timores sunt æstimandi.—7 Co. 27.—(Those fears are to be esteemed vain which do not affect a firm man.)

Qui non habet in ære, luat in corpore; ne quis peccetur impunè.—2 Inst. 173.—(He who cannot pay with his purse must suffer in person, lest any one should sin with impunity.)

Qui non habet potestatem alienandi habet necessitatem retinendi.—Hob. 336.—(He who has not the power of alienating, is obliged to retain.)

Qui non improbat, approbat.—3 Inst. 27.—(He who does not blame, approves.)

Qui non libere veritatem pronunciat proditor est veritatis.—4 Inst. Epil.—(He who does not willingly speak truth is a betrayer of the truth.)

Qui non obstat quod obstare potest, facere videtur.—2 Inst. 146.—(He who does not prevent what he can prevent, seems to commit the thing.)

Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest, assentire videtur.—2 Inst. 308.—(He who does not forbid what he can forbid, appears to assent.)

Qui non propulsat injuriam quando potest, infert.—Jenk. Cent. 271.—(He who does not repeal an injury when he can, induces it.)

Quinquagesima Sunday, Shrove Sunday.

Quinquepartite, consisting of five parts.

Quinque Portus, see CINQUE PORTS.

Quinsteme, or Quinzime, fifteenths.—13 Edw. I.

Quintal, or Kintal, a weight of 100 lbs.

Quinto exactus, the fifth or last call or requisition of a defendant sued to outlawry.

Qui obstruit aditum, destruit commodum.—Co. Litt. 161.—(He who obstructs an entry (on land) takes away the enjoyment.)

Qui omne dicit, nihil excludit.—4 Inst. 81.—(He who says all, excludes nothing.)

Qui parcit nocentibus, innocentibus punit.—Jenk. Cent. 126.—(He who spares the guilty punishes the innocent.)

Qui peccat ebrius, luat sobrius.—Cary's Rep. 133.—(Let him who sins when drunk, be punished when sober.)

Qui per alium facit, per seipsum facere videtur. Co. Litt. 258.—(He who does a thing by an agent, is considered as doing it himself.)

Qui per fraudem agit, frustrà agit.—2 Rol. Rep. 17.—(What a man does fraudulently, he does in vain.)

Qui periculum amat in eo peribit.—(He who loves danger will perish by it.)

Qui potest et debet vetare, jubet.—Gilb. 35. (He who is able and ought to forbid, commands.)

Qui primum peccat ille facit rixam.—Godb. (He who sins first, makes the strife.)

Qui prior est tempore potior est jure.—Co. Litt. 14.—(He who is first in time, is more powerful in law.)

Qui pro me aliquid facit, mihi fecisse videtur. 2 Inst. 501.—(He who does anything for me, appears to do it to me.)

Qui providet sibi providet hæredibus.—(He who provides for himself, provides for his heirs.)

Quod vanum et inutile est, lex non requirit.—Co. Litt. 319.—(The law requires not what is vain and useless.)

Quo jure, a writ which lay for him who had land wherein another challenged common of pasture, time out of mind; and it was to compel him to show by what title he challenged it. F. N. B. 158.

Quo ligatur, eo dissolvitur.—2 Rol. Rep. 21.—(By the same power by which a thing is bound, by that is it released.)

Quo minus, a writ which lay for him who had a grant of house-bote and hay-bote in another's woods against the grantor, making such waste as that the grantee could not enjoy his grant.—O. N. B. 148.

It also lay for the Queen's accountant in the Exchequer against any person against whom he had a right of action, and was called a quo minus because in it the plaintiff suggested that he was the king's farmer or debtor, and that the defendant had done him the injury or damage complained of, quo minus sufficiens existit (by which he is less able) to pay the king his debt or rent. Afterwards this suggestion of being debtor to the king was allowed to be inserted by any plaintiff who wished to proceed in that court against any defendant, as a mere matter of form, and in this way the Court of Exchequer obtained a jurisdiction coextensive with that of the Common Pleas in actions personal. The writ of quo minus was abolished by 2 Wm. IV. c. 39.—3 Bl. Com. 46.

Quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est.—Co. Litt. 147.—(When in the words there is no ambiguity, then no exposition contrary to the words is to be made.)

Quousque [Lat.] (until).

Quo warranto, a writ issuable out of the Queen's Bench in the nature of a writ of right for the Crown, against him who claims or usurps any office, franchise, or liberty, to enquire by what authority he supports his claim, in order to determine the right. It lies also in case of non-user or long neglect of a franchise, or mis-user or abuse of it, commanding the defendant to show by what warrant he exercises such a franchise, having never had any grant of it, or having forfeited it by neglect or abuse.

This writ having fallen into disuse on account of the delay with which it was attended, a more expeditious mode of proceeding has been adopted, by filing an information by the attorney-general in the nature of a quo warranto, in which the person usurping is considered as an offender, and consequently punishable by fine.

This proceeding is generally adopted for the purpose of trying the right to corporate offices, and was resorted to in so many cases after the passing of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, for 'the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales,' that the 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 78, 'to amend the Act for the regulation of municipal corporations,' provides, 'that every proceeding pending in the Queen's Bench upon any ground on which it is herein declared that the validity of the election into any corporate office shall not be questioned, or for the purpose of bringing into question the validity of any election which is herein declared to be good, shall be discontinued immediately upon the passing of this Act, upon payment of the costs incurred up to that time, to be taxed as between attorney and client.' This section (s. 20) only operates as a conditional discontinuance, and a defendant who wishes to avail himself of it must first offer to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor. By 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 78, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89, it is further enacted, that every application to the Queen's Bench for the purpose of calling upon any person to show by what warrant he claims to exercise the office of mayor, alderman, or burgess, in any borough within the Municipal Corporation Act, shall be made before the end of twelve months after the election of the defendant, or the time when he shall become disqualified; and that no election of any mayor shall be liable to be questioned by reason of a defect in the title of such person to the office of alderman or councillor, to which he may have been previously elected, unless application shall have been made to the Court of Queen's Bench, calling upon such person to show cause by what warrant he claims to exercise such office of alderman or councillor, within twelve months after his election thereto; and that every election to the office of mayor, alderman, councillor, or any other corporate officer within the said boroughs, which shall not have been called in question within twelve months after such election, shall be deemed good and valid.

Informations in the nature of quo warranto are of two kinds, and are filed either by the attorney-general, or by the coroner and attorney of the Queen, usually called the master of the Crown-office. Informations, quo warranto, filed by the attorney-general, are only filed for the purpose of trying the right to some private franchise claimed by the Crown, and usurped by a subject. When this proceeding is adopted with reference to the exercise of offices of a public nature, it can only be by leave of the court, at the relation of particular person, regulated by the preceding statutes (9 Anne, c. 20). The court exercises a discretion in granting this information, and where there is adequate relief by another mode of proceeding, the court will not generally interfere.

The application may be made in term ex parte at the relation of any body interested, but in the rule nisi all the objections to the title must be stated. The affidavit of the relator in support of the application must make out a primâ facie case. The rule nisi is drawn up and served as in other cases; if the rule be enlarged upon the defendant's application, the court will compel him to undertake, should the rule be made absolute, to appear and plead immediately to the information. The clerk of the rules in the Crown-office draws up the rule absolute, the information is filed, and recognizances in a penalty of 20*l.* to prosecute entered into, and process issued to compel an appearance, and an attachment will issue in default thereof. Upon an appearance being entered for the defendant, the prosecutor must give two four-day rules to plead, and after the expiration of the last, he should also move in term for a peremptory rule to plead, otherwise the defendant has until the next term to plead. If the defendant obtain no further time to plead, the prosecutor may sign judgment at the expiration of eighteen days from the service of the peremptory rule to plead. As soon, however, as the defendant has pleaded, a side-bar rule to reply should be entered. A plea of not guilty or non usurpavit cannot be pleaded, but only pleas to justify or disclaim. See 32 Geo. III. c. 58, s. 1. After issue joined, the record is taken down to trial. If on verdict or judgment on demurrer for the prosecutor, it appears that a vacancy exists in the corporation, the court will, on motion, grant a peremptory writ of mandamus to proceed to the election of another person in the room of the defendant; but under some circumstances a new trial or a repleader will be awarded. If the defendant appear and plead, and the prosecutor shall not, at his own costs, within a year after issue joined, proceed to try the same, or in case the defendant obtain a verdict, or a nolle prosequi is entered by the informer, the court may award taxed costs to the defendant (unless the judge shall at the trial certify that there was a reasonable cause for exhibiting the information) and unless the informer pay them within three months after demand, the defendant shall have the benefit of the recognizance to compel him.—4 & 5 W. & M. c. 18.

If, however, the defendant be adjudged guilty of an intrusion or usurpation, the court may give judgment of ouster against him, fine him, and order him to pay costs to the relator.

Rabbit, a beast of warren.

Racehorse Duty Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 82, partially repealed and amended by 20 Vict. c. 16.

Rachetum [fr. redimo, Lat.], a compensation or redemption of a thief.

Rack [fr. racke, Dut., fr. racken, to stretch], an engine of torture.

It was occasionally used for the purposes of state; but not in judicial proceedings more than once in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and its last infliction is said to have been in 1640. When, upon the assassination of Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, by Felton, it was proposed in the privy council to put the assassin to the rack, in order to discover his accomplices, the judges being consulted, declared unanimously, to their own honor and the honor of the English law, that no such proceeding was allowable by the laws of England. The uncertainty of this punishment as a test and criterion of truth, was long ago very elegantly pointed out by Cicero, though he lived in a state where it was usual to torture slaves, in order to furnish evidence. 'Tamen,' says he, 'illa tormenta gubernat dolor, moderatur natura cujusque tum animi tum corporis, regit quæsitor, flectit libido, corrumpit spes, infirmat metus; ut in tot rerum angustiis nihil veritati loci relinquatur.'—Pro Sulla, 28.

The Marquis Beccaria (on Crimes, c. xvi.), with a force of raillery truly exquisite, if the subject were not so improper for merriment, proposes this problem: 'The force of the muscles and the sensibility of the nerves of an innocent person being given, it is required to find the degree of pain necessary to make him confess himself guilty of a given crime.'—Encyc. Lond.; 4 Reeves, 411; and 5 Ib. 240; 1 Hall. Cons. Hist. c. iii., pp. 148, 150; 2 Ib. c. viii., p. 8; and 3 Ib. c. xvii., p 329.

Rack-rent, rent raised to the uttermost; the full annual value of the property.

Rack-renter, one who pays the uttermost rent.

Rack-vintage, wines drawn from the lees.

Radicals, a political party. The term arose in 1818, when the popular leaders, Hunt, Cartwright, and others, sought to obtain a radical reform in the representative system of Parliament. Bolingbroke (Disc. on Parties, Let. 18) employs the term in its present accepted sense: 'Such a remedy might have wrought a radical cure of the evil that threatens our constitution,' &c.

Railway Passengers, attempts to endanger. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, enacts that whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously put or throw upon or across any railway any wood, stone, or other matter or thing, or shall unlawfully and maliciously take up, remove, or displace any rail, sleeper, or other matter or thing belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously turn, move, or divert any points or other machinery belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously make or show[illegible]de or remove any signal or light upon or [illegible]r to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do, or cause to be done, any other matter or thing with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to endanger the safety of any person travelling or being upon such railway, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, and if a male under the age of sixteen years with or without whipping (sec. 32).

Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously throw or cause to fall or strike at, against, into or upon any engine, tender, carriage, or truck used upon any railway, any wood, stone, or other matter or thing, with intent to injure or endanger the safety of any person being in or upon such engine, tender, carriage, or truck, or in or upon any other engine, tender, carriage, or truck of any train of which such first-mentioned engine, tender, carriage, or truck shall form part, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to the same punishment, with the exception of whipping (sec. 33).

Whosoever by any unlawful act, or by any wilful omission or neglect, shall endanger, or cause to be endangered, the safety of any person conveyed, or being in or upon a railway, or shall aid or assist therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labor (sec. 34). See also 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3.

Ran, open or public theft.

Ranger, a sworn officer of the forests and parks. His office consists chiefly in three points: to walk daily through his charge, and see, hear, and inquire of trespasses in his bailwick; to drive the beasts of the forest, both of venery and chase, out of the disafforested into the forested lands; and to present all trespasses of the forest at the next court holden for the forest.—Manw.

Rank Modus, one that is too large. Rankness is a mere rule of evidence, drawn from the improbability of the fact, rather than a rule of law.

Ranking of Creditors, the arrangement of the property of a debtor, according to the claims of the creditors, and the nature of their respective securities.—Scotch phrase.

Ransom [fr. rançon, Fr.], price of redemption of a captive or prisoner of war, or for the pardon of some great offence. It differs from amerciament, because it excuses from corporal punishment.

Rape, a division of a county, especially Sussex, similar to that of a hundred, but oftentimes containing in it more hundreds than one. It was originally a military government.

Rape of the Forest, trespass committed in the forest by violence.

Rape-reeve, an obsolete officer who used to act in subordination to the shire-reeve.

Rape, the carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her consent.

'It is an accusation,' says Sir Matthew Hale, 'easy to be made, and harder to be proved, but harder to be defended by the party accused, though innocent.'

According to our system of laws, the testimony of the injured person is sufficient to condemn the criminal; yet, it not unfrequently occurs that the opinion of the physician is required in order to elucidate various difficulties connected with the accusation.

This is understood to be a membrane of a semilunar or occasionally of a circular form, which closes the orifice of the vagina, leaving, however, an aperture sufficiently large to permit the menses to pass.

Some distinguished physiologists have denied its existence altogether, or, in the cases where it is found, consider it a non-natural or morbid occurrence. Among these may be enumerated, Ambrose Parè, Palfyn, Pinæus, Columbus, Dionis, and Buffon.

Those on the contrary, who from dissection have believed in its presence, previous to sexual intercourse, or some other cause destroying it, are Fabricius, Albinus, Ruysch, Morgagni, Halber, Dremerbrock, Hiester, Riolan, Sabatier, Cuvier, Blumenbach, and Denman.

It may be wanting from original malformation, or may be destroyed by disease, or some other cause, and yet the female may be pure.

This membrane may, on the other hand, be present, and yet the female be unchaste; nay, she may become pregnant without having it destroyed.

The opinion of physiologists generally is, that it is an extremely equivocal sign.

(2) Narrowness of the vagina. In children, this part is extremely small, but it increases in size as they approach to the age of puberty. But we cannot place much reliance on this as a sign.

Parent Duchatelet informs us, as the result of actual inspection, that the genital organs of many prostitutes, some indeed of advanced years, cannot be distinguished from those of the virgin state; and the inference drawn is, that degrees of amplitude and straightness of the vagina are to many women a natural and congenital state.

(3) In the place of the hymen, certain fleshy tubercles, termed caruncuIæ myrtiformes, have been observed by anatomists, and a variety in their appearance has been considered indicative of chastity or unchastity. Zacchias remarks, that in the former they are red, tumid, and connected by fleshy cords, but, in married women, being situated at the entrance of the vagina, they are found pale, flaccid, and the cords torn asunder. They are generally considered as the remains of the hymen, 'et corruptæ adeò pudicitiæ indicia.' They are then found thick, red, and obtuse at their extremities, somewhat resembling a myrtle berry, and from this resemblance their name is derived. They generally disappear after frequent connexions or deliveries.

Systematic writers have added to these, other signs, but they are generally equivocal.

The bright red color of the nipples, the hardness of the breast, and in fine, the general appearance of the female, all deserve attention, but can seldom be of any practical utility in determining the point under examination.

In cases of young children supposed to have been violated, it will be well to remember an observation made by Devergie, and verified in repeated examinations of healthy subjects. This is, that at a tender age the labia are at a much greater distance from each other at the upper part than in more advanced years. The opening was, in repeated instances, found to be triangular, and to expose the clitoris.

Marks of external injury are to be considered as corroborating, but not as certain, proofs of the commission of a rape. The weight which they deserve depends on several circumstances, which it is proper to notice:—

(a) The age, strength, and state of mind of the respective parties.

(β) A comparison of the sexual organs may be necessary, since cases have occurred in which the male has proved impotency, or defective organization, or has exhibited proofs of the destruction of parts by the venereal disease.

(γ) A speedy examination of the parts is all important in disputed cases. The body of the male should also be inspected, whether there be scratches or bruises on it.

Doubts exist whether a rape can be consummated on a grown female, in good health and strength.

The great points to be looked to, says Mr. Alison, are: (1) whether they make resistance and cry out before they were discovered; (2) whether they had received blows and actual injury, it being quite certain that at least that violence was inflicted against the will.

Metzger only allows of three cases in which the crime can be consummated; where narcotics have been administered; where many are engaged against the female; and, where a strong man attacks one who is not arrived at the age of puberty.

Notwithstanding all the authorities, it may with justice be supposed, that fear or terror may operate on a helpless female; she may resist for a long time, and then faint from fatigue; or the dread of instant murder may lead to the abandonment of active resistance.

The following maxims, says Foderé (which he quotes from Bœrius), have been adopted for thirty years in Neapolitan jurisprudence, viz. that in accusations for rape, there be full proof of the following facts: (1) that there has been a constant and equal resistance on the part of the person violated; (2) that there is an evident inequality of strength between the parties; (3) that she has raised cries; and (4) that there be some marks of violence present.

In Scotland, according to Baron Hume, the following facts are necessary to be proved on a charge of rape: (1) penetration, but there is no distinct reference made to emission; (2) actual force in the consummation, but it is held to be forcible knowledge, if the female discontinue her resistance out of fear of death, or be rendered incapable of it by the giving of narcotic drugs, or be under the age of puberty.

Three questions relating to this subject have at various times been discussed, and they all deserve a brief notice: (1) Whether the presence of the venereal disease in the female violated, is a proof in favor of or against her accusation? If, on examination, the marks of this disease be found recent, it will be proper to consider them as corroborating circumstances; it is necessary, however, to remark that the symptoms of venereal infection do not commonly make their appearance until three days after receiving it, while the examination should be made within that time; should the appearances indicate anything like a disease of long standing, they must, of course, tend to weaken the complaint of the female.

(2) Can a female be violated during sleep without her knowledge? If the sleep have been caused by powerful narcotics, by intoxication, or if syncope, or excessive fatigue, be present, it is possible that this may occur, and it ought then to be considered, to all intents, a rape. In such cases the quantity of stupifying drugs administered may be so great as to render her unable, even if awakened by the violence, to withdraw from it.

(3) Does pregnancy ever follow rape? On this question a great diversity of opinion has existed. It was formerly supposed that a certain degree of enjoyment was necessary in order to cause conception, and accordingly the presence of pregnancy was deemed to exclude the idea of a rape. Late writers, however, urge that the functions of the uterine system are, in a great degree, independent of the will, and that there may be physical constraint on those organs sufficient to induce the required state, although the will itself is not consenting. We do not know, nor shall probably ever know, what is necessary to cause conception, but if we reason from analogy, we shall certainly find cases where females have conceived while under the influence of narcotics, of intoxication, and even of asphyxia, and consequently without knowing or partaking of the enjoyment that is insisted on. Pregnancy, then, is not incompatible with the idea of rape under the limitations laid down. Several writers on this subject are, however, of a different opinion, and particularly Dr. Bartley, who goes so far as to recommend that pregnancy shall be considered a proof of acquiescence, and that, in order to ascertain this, the punishment of the criminal be delayed till the requisite time.

'It was formerly supposed,' says East, 'that if a woman conceived, it was no rape, because that showed her consent; but it is now admitted on all hands, that such an opinion has no sort of foundation either in reason or law.'—Vol. I. 445; Beck's Med. Juris. 88; and Tayl. Med. Jurisp. c. 51.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 48, 'Whosoever shall be convicted of the crime of rape shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor.' See 4 Step. Com. 169; Arch. Crim. Evid. 805, et seq.

Rapine [fr. rapina, Lat.], the taking a thing against the owner's will, openly or by violence; robbery. See LARCENY.

Raptu hæredis, a writ for taking away an heir holding in socage; of which there were two sorts, one when the heir was married, the other when he was not.—Reg. Orig. 163.

Rastell. Among the ancient law-writers of the reign of Henry VIII. are to be reckoned John Rastell, the printer and lawyer, and his son William Rastell, the lawyer and printer. The former was bred a printer, and though he did not take to the practice of the law, yet it evidently appears from his works that he had been a diligent student. The latter, though educated for the bar and a practiser, succeeded to his father's occupation, which he seems to have united with his profession, till the honors of the latter called upon him to decline it altogether. John Rastell translated from the French the 'Abridgment of the Statutes prior to the time of Henry VII.' He also abridged those of Henry VII., and down to the 23rd and 24th of Henry VIII., which were printed together by the son William in 1533. This was the first abridgment in the English language, and it is introduced by the author with a long preface, recommending the printing of law-books in English, and ascribing great praise to Henry VII. for first directing the statutes to be made in the mother-tongue. To this writer are ascribed two other books, 'Les Termes de la Ley,' and 'The Tables to Fitzherbert's Abridgment.' The title of authorship has, however, been disputed with respect to these two works, which have by some been given to the son, William. As to 'Les Termes de la Ley,' it was ascribed to John by Bale; but it is omitted by Pitts in his account of him, and peremptorily denied to be his by Wood, who as positively attributes it to William. That was Lord Coke's opinion; but Bishop Tanner again restores it to John. Perhaps it may be giving to each his distinct merit, if we suppose that John composed the original work in French, and that William made the translation, which was printed by him, and was never doubted to be his.

To William Rastell is ascribed a tract called 'The Chartulary,' printed in 1534; but there seems no pretence for this supposition, and the work is no more than the tract which had before been printed under the title of 'Carta Feodi Simplicis.' He made a table to Fitzherbert's 'New Natura Brevium,' and another of the 'Pleas of the Crown.' The tables to 'Fitzherbert's Abridgment,' which are ascribed by some to him, are the same probably that were before made by his father, and were reprinted by William. The performances, therefore, which must distinguish William Rastell, belong to a later period than the reign of Henry VIII. These are his collection of English statutes printed in 1559, and his 'Entries,' printed long after his death in 1596.—4 Reeves, 418.

Rasure, the act of scraping or shaving.

Rasure of a deed, so as to alter it in a material part, without consent of the party bound by it, &c., will make the same void; and if it be rased in the date after delivery, it is said it goes through the whole. Where a deed by rasure, addition, or alteration becomes no deed, the defendant may plead non est factum.—5 Rep. 23.

A rasure or interlineation in a deed is presumed, in the absence of rebutting evidence, to have been made at or before its execution; but in a will it is presumed to have been made after its execution. See INTERLINEATION.

Rate, a valuation of an estate, or the appointing or setting down how much every one shall contribute to any tax.

Rate of Exchange, the price at which a bill drawn in one country upon another may be sold in the former.

Rate-tithe, when any sheep, or other cattle, are kept in a parish for less time than a year, the owner must pay tithe for them pro ratâ, according to the custom of the place.—F. N. B. 51.

Ratification, confirmation.

Ratihabitio, confirmation, agreement, consent, approbation of a contract.

Ratihabitio mandato æquiparatur.—(Ratification is tantamount to a direction.)

Ratio, an account, a rule of proportion; also, a cause, or giving judgment therein.

Ratio est formalis causa consuetudinis.—(Reason is the formal cause of custom.)

Ratio est legis anima, mutatâ legis ratione mutatur et lex.—7 Co. 7.—(Reason is the soul of law; the reason of law being changed, the law is also changed.)

Ratio est radius divini luminis.—Co. Litt. 232.—(Reason is a ray of the divine light.)

Ratio et auctoritas duo clarissima mundi lumina.—4 Inst. 320.—(Reason and authority, the two brightest lights of the world.)

Ratio legis est anima legis.—Jenk. Cent. 45. (The reason of law is the soul of law.)

Ratio potest allegari deficiente lege. Sed ratio vera et legalis, et non apparens.—Co. Litt. 191.—(Reason may be alleged when law is defective. But it must be true and legal reason, and not apparent.)

Rationabile estoverium, alimony.

Rationabilibus divisis, an abolished writ which lay where two lords, in divers towns, had seignories adjoining, for him who found his waste by little and little to have been encroached upon, against the other, who had encroached, thereby to rectify their bounds.

Rationabili parte, an old writ of right for lands, &c.

Rationabili parte bonorum, a writ which lay for a wife after her husband's death, against the executors of the husband, for her third or reasonable part of his goods, after debts and funeral charges paid.—F. N. B. 122, L.; 1 Wms. Ex. 2.

Rationabilis dos, a widow's thirds, or reasonable dower.

Rationes [M. Lat.], the pleadings in a suit. Rationes exercere, or ad rationes stare, to plead.

Ravishment, forcible violation. See Abduction and Rape.

Ravishment de Gard (ravishment of ward), an abolished writ which lay for a guardian by knight's service or in socage, against a person who took from him the body of his ward.—F. N. B. 140; 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Re-afforested, where a de-afforested forest is again made a forest.

Reader, a lecturer or prælector.

Reading-in. The title of a person admitted, to a rectory or other benefice, will be divested unless within two months after actual possession he publicly read in the church of the benefice, upon some Lord's day, and at the appointed times, the morning and evening service, according to the Book of Common Prayer; and afterwards, publicly before the congregation, declare his assent to such book; and also publicly read the thirty-nine articles in the same church, in the time of common prayer, with declaration of his assent thereto; and, moreover, within three months after his admission, read upon some Lord's day in the same church, in the presence of the congregation, in the time of divine service, a declaration, by him subscribed before the ordinary, of conformity to the liturgy, together with the certificate of the ordinary of its having been so subscribed.—3 Step. Com. 30.

Reading of Deed. See Deed.

Readmission of Solicitors and Attornies. See Smi. Ch. Pr. 54; and 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 57, 152.

Real Action, one brought for the specific recovery of lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

Among the civilians, real actions, otherwise called vindications, are those in which a man demanded something that was his own. They were founded on dominion, or jus in re.

The real actions of the Roman law were not like the real actions of the common law, confined to real estate, but they included personal as well as real property. But the same distinction as to classes of remedies and actions pervades the common and civil law. Thus we have in the common law, the distinct classes of real actions, personal actions, and mixed actions. The first, embracing those which concern real estate where the proceeding is purely in rem; the next, embracing all suits in personam for contracts and torts; and the last, embracing those mixed suits where the person is liable by reason of and in connexion with property.—Story's Confl. Laws. 781.

Real Burden, a condition imposed on an estate, which is effectual against creditors and heirs.—Scotch phrase.

Real Chattels. See Chattels.

Real Estate, landed property, including all estates and interests in lands which are held for life or for some greater estate, and whether such lands be of freehold or copyhold tenure.

Reality. See Personality of Laws.

Real Laws. Laws purely real directly and indirectly regulate property, and the rights of property, without intermeddling with or changing the state of the person.

In regard to laws purely real, Boullenois lays down the rule in the broadest terms, that they govern all real property within the territory, but have no extension beyond it. Les lois réelles n'ont point d'extension directe ni indirecte hors la jurisdiction et la domination du législateur.—Story's Confl. Laws. 426.

Real Right, the right of property, jus in re. The person having such right may sue for the subject itself. A personal right, jus ad rem, entitles the party only to an action for performance of the obligation.

Real things, things substantial and immovable, and the rights and profits annexed to or issuing out of them.

Real Warrandice, an infeoffment of one tenement given in security of another.—Scotch phrase.

Realm, a kingdom or country.

Realty, thing real; landed property, &c.

Reason, the very life of law, for when the reason of a law once ceases, the law itself generally ceases, because reason is the foundation of all our laws.—Co. Litt. 97.

Reasonable aid, a duty claimed by the lord of the fee of his tenants, holding by knight service, to marry his daughter, &c.

Reasonable cause, a proper consideration.

Reasonable part. See RATIONABILI PARTE.

Re-assurance, a contract that a first insurer enters into in order to release himself from a risk which he may have incautiously undertaken by throwing it upon some other insurer. Such contracts are prohibited by 19 Geo. II. c. 37, s. 4, except in the event of the original insurer's insolvency, bankruptcy, or death, when a reassurance may lawfully be made by himself, or his representatives or assigns, provided the transactions be declared by the policy to be of that description. Re-assurance is not to be confounded with double insurance, which see.—2 Selw. N. P. 1023. As to the duty on re-assurance in the case of fire-policies, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 22, s. 6.

Re-attachment, a second attachment of him who was formerly attached and dismissed the court without day, by the not coming of the justices, or some such casualty.—Reg. Orig. 35.

Rebate, discount; reducing the interest of money in consideration of prompt payment.

Rebellion, the taking up of arms traitorously against the Crown, whether by natural subjects or others, when once subdued; also, disobedience to the process of the courts.

Rebellion, Commission of, one of the abolished processes of contempt in the High Court of Chancery.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xxx., r. 5.

Rebellious assembly, a gathering of twelve persons or more, intending, going about, or practising unlawfully and of their own authority, to change any laws of the realm, or to destroy the enclosure of any park or ground enclosed; banks of fish-ponds, pools, conduits, &c., to the intent the same shall remain void, or that they shall have way in any of the said grounds; or to destroy the deer in any park, fish in ponds, coneys in any warren, dove-houses, &c.; or to burn stacks of corn; or to abate rents, or prices of victuals, &c.

Rebouter, to repel or bar.

Rebut, to bar, repel, or contradict.

Rebutter [fr. repello, Lat., to put back or bar], the answer of a defendant to a plaintiff's surrejoinder.

Rebutting evidence, that which is given by one party in a cause, to explain, repel, counteract or disprove evidence produced by the other party.

Recall, to supersede a minister, or deprive him of his office; also to revoke a judgment on a matter of fact.

Recaption, the taking a second distress of one formerly distrained, during the plea, grounded on the former distress. It is a writ to recover damages for him, whose goods being distrained for rent in service, &c., are distrained again for the same cause, pending the plea in the county court or before the justices.—F. N. B. 71.

It is also a species of remedy by the mere act of the party injured. This happens when any one has deprived another of his property, in goods or chattels personal, or wrongfully detains one's wife, child, or servant, in which case the owner of the goods, and the husband, parent, or master, may lawfully claim and retake them, wherever he happens to find them, so it be not in a riotous manner, or attended with a breach of the peace and so that he favor not the thief.

Recapture, the recovery by force of a prize captured by an enemy.

Receditur à placitis juris potius quam injuriæ et delicta maneant impunita.—Bacon.—(We surrender the forms of law rather than allow injuries to remain unpunished.)

Receipt, or Receit, an acknowledgment in writing of having received a sum of money, or other valuable consideration; it is a voucher either of an obligation or debt discharged, or of one incurred.

By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, a penny stamp-duty is imposed on a receipt or discharge given for or upon the payment of money amounting to two pounds or upwards. Exemption:—Receipts given for money deposited in any bank, or in the hands of any banker, to be accounted for, whether with interest or not, provided the same be not expressed to be received of or by the hands of any other than the person to whom the same is to be accounted for. Provided always, that this exemption shall not extend to receipts or acknowledgments for sums paid or deposited for or upon letters of allotment of shares, or in respect of calls upon any scrip, or shares of or in any joint-stock or other company, or proposed or intended company; which said last-mentioned receipts or acknowledgments, by whomsoever given, shall be liable to the duty by this Act charged on receipts.

Receiptor. A person to whom property is bailed by an officer, who has attached it upon mesne process, to answer to the exigency of the writ, and satisfy the judgment, the understanding being to have it forthcoming on demand. See Story on Bailments, p. 145.

Receiver, one to whom anything is communicated by another. Also, an officer of the Court of Chancery appointed to collect rents, &c. pending a suit. Receivers are usually appointed in suits concerning the estates of infants, against executors, and between partners for the purpose of winding-up the business. A practising barrister may be a receiver, but a solicitor in the cause cannot, unless by consent, and he will act without salary; nor can the receiver-general of a county; for the Crown might by its prerogative, sweep away the whole of his property; nor can peers, next friends of infant-plaintiffs, nor trustees, be receivers. The allowance to the receiver depends on the degree of difficulty experienced in the collection; the usual allowance is 5*l.* per cent. on the gross rental. The security required by the court is that a receiver shall enter into a recognizance jointly with two sureties in double the amount of the yearly value of the estate to be collected. He passes his accounts in the chief clerk's office, and pays the balance into the office of the accountant-general. At the termination of his office, he should apply to have his recognizance vacated, and for his own discharge from the receivership. See Sm. Ch. Pr. 607, et seq.

Receiver of the Fines, an officer who receives the money of all such as compound with the Crown on original writs sued out of Chancery.

Receiver-General of the Duchy of Lancaster, an officer of the Duchy Court, who collects all the revenues, fines, forfeitures, and assessments within the duchy.

Receiver-General of the Public Revenue, an officer appointed in every county to receive the taxes granted by Parliament, and remit the money to the treasury.

Receiver of Stolen Property. By 24 and 25 Vict., c. 96, it is enacted:—

'Whosoever shall receive any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, the stealing, taking, extorting, obtaining, embezzling, or otherwise disposing whereof, shall amount to a felony at common law, or by virtue of this Act, knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen, taken, extorted, obtained, embezzled, or disposed of, shall be guilty of felony, and may be indicted and convicted either as an accessary after the fact or for a substantive felony, and in the latter case, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice, and every such receiver, howsoever convicted, shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor and with or without solitary confinement, and if a male under the age of sixteen years with or without whipping. Provided that no person, howsoever tried for receiving as aforesaid, shall be liable to be prosecuted a second time for the same offence' (s. 91).

'In any indictment containing a charge of feloniously stealing any property it shall be lawful to add a count or several counts for feloniously receiving the same, or any part or parts thereof, knowing the same to have been stolen; and in any indictment for feloniously receiving any property knowing it to have been stolen it shall be lawful to add a count for feloniously stealing the same, and where any such indictment shall have been preferred and found against any person the prosecutor shall not be put to his election, but it shall be lawful for the jury who shall try the same to find a verdict of guilty either of stealing the property or of receiving the same or any part or parts thereof knowing the same to have been stolen; and if such indictment shall have been preferred and found against two or more persons it shall be lawful for the jury who shall try the same to find all or any of the said persons guilty either of stealing the property or of receiving the same or any part or parts thereof knowing the same to have been stolen, or to find one or more of the said persons guilty of stealing the property, and the other or others of them guilty of receiving the same or any part or parts thereof knowing the same to have been stolen' (s. 92).

'Whenever any property whatsoever shall have been stolen, taken, extorted, obtained, embezzled or otherwise disposed of in such a manner as to amount to a felony, either at common law or by virtue of this Act, any number of receivers at different times of such property, or of any part or parts thereof, may be charged with substantive felonies in the same indictment, and may be tried together, notwithstanding that the principal felon shall not be included in the same indictment, or shall not be in custody or amenable to justice' (s. 93).

'If upon the trial of any two or more persons indicted for jointly receiving any property, it shall be proved that one or more of such persons separately received any part or parts of such property, it shall be lawful for the jury to convict upon such indictment such of the said persons as shall be proved to have received any part or parts of such property' (s. 94).

'Whosoever shall receive any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, the stealing, taking, obtaining, converting, or disposing whereof is made a misdemeanor by this Act, knowing the same to have been unlawfully stolen, taken, obtained, converted, or disposed of, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be indicted and convicted thereof whether the person guilty of the principal misdemeanor shall or shall not have been previously convicted thereof, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice, and every such receiver being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement, and if a male under the age of sixteen years with or without whipping' (sec. 95).

'Whosoever shall receive any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, knowing the same to have been feloniously or unlawfully stolen, taken, obtained, converted, or disposed of, may, whether charged as an accessary after the fact to the felony, or with a substantive felony, or with a misdemeanor only, be dealt with, indicted, tried, and punished in any county or place in which he shall have or shall have had any such property in his possession, or in any county or place in which the party guilty of the principal felony or misdemeanor may by law be tried, in the same manner as such receiver may be dealt with, indicted, tried, and punished in the county or place where he actually received such property' (sec. 96).

'Where the stealing or taking of any property whatsoever is by this Act punishable on summary conviction, either for every offence or for the first and second offence only, or for the first offence only, any person who shall receive any such property, knowing the same to be unlawfully come by, shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, be liable, for every first, second, or subsequent offence of receiving, to the same forfeiture and punishment to which a person guilty of a first, second, or subsequent offence of stealing or taking such property is by this Act made liable' (sec. 97).

Receivers of Wreck, or Droit, officers appointed by the Board of Trade, pursuant to 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 439–457, for the preservation of wreck, &c. The Act provides for their duties and powers.

Receptus, an arbitrator.—Civ. Law.

Recession, a re-grant.

Récidive [Fr.], a relapse; the commission of a second offence.

Reciprocity, mutuality.

Recital, the rehearsal or making mention in a deed or writing of something which has been done before.—1 Lill. Abr. 416. See DEED.

Reclaimed animals, those that are made tame by art, industry, or education, whereby a qualified property may be acquired in them. See FERÆ NATURÆ.

Reclaiming, the action of a lord pursuing, prosecuting, and recalling his vassal, who had gone to live in another place, without his permission. Also for the demanding of a thing or person to be delivered up or surrendered to the prince or state it properly belongs to, when by an irregular means it has come into the possession of another.

Reclaiming bill, a petition of appeal against the judgment of any lord ordinary or the Court of Sessions in Scotland.

Recognition, an acknowledgment.

Recognitione adnullandâ per vim et duritiem factâ, a writ to the justices of the Common Bench for sending a record touching a recognizance, which the recognizor suggests was acknowledged by force and duress; that if it so appear, the recognizance may be disannulled. Reg. Orig. 183.

Recognitors, the jury impannelled in an assize; so called because they acknowledged a disseisin by their verdict.—Bract. l. 5.

Recognizance. This is of two sorts: (1) at common law, which is an obligation, acknowledged and enrolled in a court of law with a condition to be void on the performance of a thing stipulated; it differs from a bond, in that the latter is a creation of a new debt, while a recognizance is an acknowledgment upon record of a former debt owing to our sovereign lady the Queen; (2) by statute, which are, the statute-merchant, created by 11 Edw. I. (Acton Burnell), and the statute-staple, created by 27 Edw. III. stat. 2. They are both obsolete. See Coote on Mort. 76.

Recognizee, he to whom one is bound in a recognizance.

Recognizor, he who enters into a recognizance.

Récolement [Fr.], re-examination.

Re-compensation. Where a party sues for a debt, and the defendant pleads compensation, the plaintiff may allege a compensation on his part, and this is called a re-compensation.—Scotch term.

Reconduction, a relocation, a renewal of a lease.—Civ. Law.

Reconvention, an action by a defendant against a plaintiff in a former action; a cross-bill or litigation.—Ibid.

Record, a memorial or remembrance; an authentic testimony in writing contained in rolls of parchment, and preserved in a court of record. The public records of the kingdom are placed under the superintendence of the Master of the Rolls, and a Record Office established by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 94.

There are three kinds of records, viz.: (1) judicial, as an attainder; (2) ministerial, on oath, being an office or inquisition found; (3) by way of conveyance, as a deed enrolled.

Record, Conveyances by, extraordinary assurances, as private Acts of Parliament, and royal grants.

Record, Courts of, those whose judicial acts and proceedings are enrolled in parchment, for a perpetual memorial and testimony; which rolls are called the records of the court, and are of such high and supereminent authority, that their truth is not to be called in question. Every court of record has authority to fine and imprison for contempt of its authority.—3 Step. Com. 380.

Record, Debts of, those which appear to be due by the evidence of a court of record, such as a judgment, recognizance, &c.

Record of Nisi Prius, a transcript of the pleadings and issue, on parchment, for the use of the court on the trial of the action.

Record, Trial by. If a record be asserted on one side to exist, and the opposite party deny its existence under the form of traverse, 'that there is no such record remaining in court as alleged,' and issue be joined thereon, this is called an issue of nul tiel record; and the court awards in such a case a trial by inspection and examination of the record. Upon this, the party affirming its existence is bound to produce it in court on a day given for the purpose; and if he fail to do so, judgment is given for his adversary. The trial by record is not only in use when an issue of this kind happens to arise for decision, but it is the only legitimate mode of trying such issue, and the parties cannot put themselves upon the country.—Step. Plead. 112; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 925.

Record and Writ Clerks, three officers of the Court of Chancery appointed by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103. As to their duties, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 28; and Consol. Ord. 1860, I., rr. 35–53.

Recordari facias loquelam [abbrev. re. fa. lo.], an original writ, in the nature of a certiorari, issuing out of Chancery, addressed to a sheriff to remove a cause depending in an inferior court not of record to a superior court; and it is called a recordari, because it commands the sheriff to make a record of the plaint in the ancient county-court, and then to send up the cause. Obsolete.—F. N. B. 71.

Recorda sunt vestigia vetustatis et veritatis. 2 Rol. Rep. 296.—(Records are the footsteps of antiquity and truth.)

Recorder, a person whom the mayor and other magistrates of any city or town corporate, having jurisdiction in a court of record within their precincts by the royal grant, associate unto them for their better direction in matters of justice and proceedings according to law. He is usually a barrister of some standing.—5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 103; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 3; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89, s. 8.

Recorder of London, one of the justices of oyer and terminer, and a justice of the peace of the quorum for putting the laws in execution for the preservation of the peace and government of the city. Being the mouth of the city, he delivers the sentences and judgments of the courts therein, and also certifies and records the city customs, &c. He is chosen by the lord mayor and aldermen, and attends the business of the city when summoned by the lord mayor, &c.

Recoup [fr. recouper, Fr., to cut again], the keeping back or stopping something which is due; discount; recompense.

Recoupment, the act of recouping.

Recoverer, the demandant in a common recovery after judgment.

Recovery, the obtaining a thing by judgment or trial.

A true recovery is an actual or real recovery of anything, or the value thereof, by judgment; as if a man sue for any land or other thing movable or immovable, and gain a verdict or judgment.

A feigned recovery. An abolished common assurance by matter of record, in fraud of the statute De Donis, whereby a tenant-in-tail enlarged his estate-tail into a fee-simple, and so barred the entail, and all remainders and reversions expectant thereon, with all conditions and collateral limitations annexed to them, and subsequent charges subordinate to the entail. But incumbrances on the estate-tail equally affected such fee-simple, and any estate or interest prior to the entail remained undisturbed.

This assurance consisted of two parts: (1) the recovery itself, which was a fictitious real action in the Court of Common Pleas, carried on to judgment, and founded on the supposition of an adverse claim; and (2) the recovery-deed, which was partly a preparatory step to suffering the recovery, and partly a declaration of the uses when suffered.

Recoveries were either legal or equitable.

The parties to a recovery action were: (1) the Demandant, or Recoveror, who was merely a formal party for the purpose of supporting the character of plaintiff; (2) the Tenant, or Recoveree, who was the person in whom the immediate freehold resided, and against whom the lands were to be demanded by the plaintiff; and (3) the Vouchee, who was called to warrant or vouch upon a supposed warranty, and took the defence on himself.

The action was begun by a writ of entry brought by the demandant, who was a mere nominee or stranger, against him whose estate-tail was to be barred, who appeared and in defence vouched over the common vouchee—the crier of the court—if the recovery had been with a single voucher, which however, was rarely, if ever, used, as it only barred the estate of which he was actually seised, but more usually against a person, who was made by a previous conveyance the tenant to the præcipe or writ, and who vouched the tenant-in-tail, who vouched over the common vouchee, which was called a recovery with double voucher, and effectually barred the entail, with every latent interest and all reversions and remainders expectant thereon. The only possible case in which a remainder with treble voucher was necessary was in the instance in which a tenant-in-tail created an entail derived out of his own, and the two entails were, in point of estate or of right, existing at one time in distinct persons, and both entails were to be barred.

To perfect the legal title, and to give a seisin to the demandant, a writ of habere facias seisinam must have been issued after judgment, and seisin duly delivered to him whereupon the uses arose. This writ was returned by the sheriff, and the proceedings exemplified by the clerk of the court for the purpose of proving the suffering of the recovery. In a recovery-deed the proper parties, either alone or jointly with other persons, as circumstances might have required, were: (1) the person who had the immediate freehold; (2) the intended vouchee; (3) the intended tenant; and (4) the intended demandant. See 1 Shepp. Touch. c. iii. and 1 Prest. Conv. c. 1. As to its origin and establishment, see 1 Hall. Cons. Hist. c. i., p. 12. The fiction was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. See TAIL.

The best evidence of a recovery is the exemplification, and the attention should be drawn to these points—whether the recovery correspond with the recovery-deed as to date, parties, and parcels; whether there be a clear and undoubted tenant to the præcipe; and whether there be any outstanding estate of freehold in a dowress, jointress, tenant by the curtesy, or other tenant for life, which would render the assurance defective or exceptionable. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 13; 5 Vict. 32; and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70.

Recreant, yielding. See CRAVEN.

Recrimination, a charge made by an accused person against the accuser.

Recruit, a soldier newly enlisted.

Recta prisa regis, the king's writ to prisage, or taking of one butt or pipe of wine before, and another behind the mast, as a custom for every ship laden with wines. See PRISAGE.

Rectitudo, right or justice; legal dues, tribute or payment.

Recto, Breve de, a writ of right, which was of so high a nature, that as other writs in real actions were only to recover the possession of the land, &c. in question, this aimed to recover the seisin and the property, and thereby both the rights of possession and property were tried together.

There were two species: (1) writ of right-patent, so called, because it was sent open, and was the highest writ lying for him who had a fee-simple in the lands or tenements sued for, against tenant of the freehold at least, and in no other case; this writ was likewise called breve magnum de recto; (2) writ of right-close, which was brought where one held lands and tenements by charter in ancient demesne in fee-simple, fee-tail, or for term of life, or in dower, and was disseised.—Co. Litt. 158. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Recto de advocatione ecclesiæ, a writ which lay at common law, where a man had right of advowson of a church, and the parson dying, a stranger had presented.—F. N. B. 30.

Recto de custodiâ terræ et hæredis, a writ of right of ward of the land and heir. Abolished.

Recto de dote, a writ of right of dower, which lay for a widow who had received part of her dower, and demanded the residue, against the heir of the husband or his guardian. Abolished. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26, and DOWER.

Recto de dote unde nihil habet, a writ of right of dower whereof she had nothing, which lay where her deceased husband, having divers lands or tenements, had assured no dower to his wife, and she thereby was driven to sue for her thirds against the heir or his guardian. Abolished. See Ibid.

Recto quando (or quia) dominus remisit curiam, a writ of right, when or because the lord had remitted his court, which lay where lands or tenements in the seignory of any lord were in demand by a writ of right.—F. N. B. 16.

Recto de rationabile parte, a writ of right, of the reasonable part, which lay between privies in blood, as brothers in gavelkind, sisters, and other coparceners, for land in fee-simple.—F. N. B. 9.

Recto sur disclaimer, an abolished writ on disclaimer.

Rector, a governor; he that has that part of the revenues of a church, which heretofore was appropriated to some of the monasteries; or one who has the whole revenues.

Rector sinecure, one without cure of souls.

Rectorial tithes, great or predial tithes.

Rectory, a spiritual non-appropriated living, composed of land, tithe, and other oblations of the people, separate or dedicate to God, in any congregation for the service of his church there, and for the maintenance of the governor or minister thereof, to whose charge the same is committed.—Spel.

Rectum, right; also, a trial or accusation.—Bract.

Rectum esse, to be right in court.

Rectum rogare, to ask for right; to petition the judge to do right.

Rectum, stare ad, to stand trial, or abide by the sentence of the court.

Rectus in curiâ, one who stands at the bar of a court, and no accusation is made against him; also, said of an outlaw when he has reversed his outlawry.

Recuperatio, i. e. ad rem, per injuriam extortam sive detentam, per sententiam judicis restitutio.—Co. Litt. 154 a.—(Recovery, that is, restitution by sentence of a judge to a thing wrongfully extorted or detained.)

Recuperatio est alicujus rei in causam alterius adductæ per judicem acquisitio.—Ibid.—(Recovery is the acquisition, by sentence of a judge, of anything brought into the cause of another.)

Recuperatores, judges to whom the prætor referred a question.—Civil Law.

Recurrendum est ad extraordinarium quando non valet ordinarium.—(We must have recourse to what is extraordinary, when what is ordinary fails.)

Recusants, persons who wilfully absent themselves from their parish-church, and on whom penalties were imposed by various statutes passed during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

Recusatio judicis, a refusal of, or exception to a judge upon any suspicion of partiality.—Civil Law.

Red [fr. rœd, Sax.], advice.

Red-Book of the Exchequer [liber rubens scaccarii, Lat.], an ancient record, wherein are registered the names of those who held lands per baroniam in the time of Henry II.—Ryley, 667.

Reddendo singula singulis.—5 Co. 7 b.—(By giving to each that which peculiarly belongs to it.)

Reddendum, a clause reserving rent in a lease, whereby a lessor retains some new thing to himself out of that which he granted before: it commonly and properly succeeds the habendum, and is usually made by the words 'yielding and paying,' or similar expressions.

In every good reservation these things must always concur:—(1) It must be by certain and apt words. Thus, a lease for years, reserving rent 'after the rate' of 18*l.* a year, is void for uncertainty. (2) It must be of some other thing issuing or coming out of the thing granted, and not a part of the thing itself, nor of some thing issuing out of another thing. (3) It must be of such thing whereunto the grantor may have resort to distrain. (4) It must be made to one of the grantors, and not to a stranger to the deed.—Woodf. Land. and Ten. 102. See DEED.

Reddere, nil aliud est quam acceptum restituere: seu, reddere est quasi retrò dare; et redditur dicitur a redeundo, quia retrò it.—Co. Litt. 142.—(To render is nothing more than to restore that which has been received; or, to render is as it were to give back, and it is called rendering from returning, because it goes back again.)

Reddidit se (he has rendered himself), applied to a principal, who renders himself to prison in discharge of his bail.

Redditarius, a renter.

Redditarium, a rental of an estate or manor.

Reddition, a surrendering or restoring; also, a judicial acknowledgment that the thing in demand belongs to the demandant, and not to the person surrendering.

Redditus cæcus et siccus.—6 Co. 58.—(Rent blind and barren.)

Redeemable rights, rights which return to the conveyor or disposer of land, &c. upon payment of the sum for which such rights are granted.

Re-delivery, a yielding and delivering back of a thing.

Re-demise, a regranting of lands demised or leased.

Redemption, a ransom or commutation.

Redemption, Equity of. See EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

Redemption of Land-tax. The redemption of the land-tax is proved by the certificate of the commissioners, the receipt of the cashier of the Bank of England, and memorandum of registration. See LAND-TAX.

Redhibition [fr. redhibitio, Lat.], an action allowed to a buyer, by which to annul the sale of some movable, and oblige the seller to take it back again, upon the buyer's finding it damaged, or that there was some deceit, &c.—Civ. law; Sand. Just. 464.

Re-disseisin, a disseisin made by him who once before was bound and adjudged to have disseised the same person of his lands or tenements.—F. N. B. 188; 1 Reeves, 263.

Reditus albi, white rents, or rents paid in silver.

Reditus assisus, a set or standing rent.

Reditus capitales, chief rents paid by freeholders to go quit of all other services.

Reditus nigri, black mail; rents paid in grain or base money.

Reditus quieti, quit rents, which see.

Reditus siccus, a rent seck, or barren; the owner of which has neither seignory nor reversion, nor any express power of distress reserved to him.—See 4 Geo. II. c. 28.

Redmans, or Radmans, men who, by the tenure or custom of their lands, were to ride with or for the lord of the manor, about his business.—Domesday.

Re-draft, a second bill of exchange.

Red Sea and Indian Telegraph Act, 1859, amended by 24 Vict. c. 4; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 39.

Redubbers, persons who bought stolen cloth and turned it into some other color or fashion, that it might not be known again.—3 Inst. 134.

Reduction, an action for the purpose of repealing or rendering null and void some deed or claim.—Scotch term.

Reduction Improbation, the reduction is a rescissory action by which deeds, services, decrees, or illegal acts by any body corporate may be rendered void. The action of reduction has a certification which renders the deed called for and not produced incapable of receiving any effect until it be produced. The action of improbation is founded on actual forgery, and the certification thereon has the effect of rendering the deed called for, and not produced, for ever void and null. The junction of two actions which forms what is called the reduction-improbation, confers on the simple reduction all the efficacy of the improbation, and secures the person who uses it from all future trouble from the deed called for, if it be not produced in the action.—Scotch Law.

Redundancy, impertinent or foreign matter inserted in a pleading.

Re-entry, the resuming or retaking that possession which any one has lately foregone.

Re-entry, proviso for a clause, usually inserted in leases, that upon non-payment of rent, &c. the term shall cease.—Wood. Land. and Ten. 270.

Reeve [fr. gerefa, Sax.], a steward or bailiff.

Re-examination, a second examination of a witness after a cross-examination.

Re-exchange, the amount for which a bill of exchange can be purchased in the country where the acceptance is made, drawn upon the drawer or indorser in the country where he resides, which will give the holder of the original bill a sum exactly equal to the amount of that bill at the time when it ought to be paid, or when he is able to draw the re-exchange bill, together with his necessary expenses and interest, for that is precisely the sum which the holder is entitled to receive, and which will indemnify him for its non-payment.

It is supposed that the Ghibelins, driven out of Italy by the faction of the Guelphs, and sheltered at Amsterdam, first established the custom of re-exchange, on the pretence of the interest, damages, and expenses they underwent when the bills given them for the effects they had been obliged to abandon were not accepted, but came to be protested.—Story on Bills, 470.

Re-extent, a second extent on lands or tenements, on complaint that the former was partially made, &c.

Re. Fa. Lo., the abbreviation of recordari facias loquelam, which see.

Refare, to bereave, take away, rob.

Refection, reparation of a building.—Civ. Law.

Referee, one to whom anything is referred; an arbitrator.

Reference, the sending of any matter of enquiry by the Court of Chancery to a chief clerk, a taxing master, or a conveyancing counsel, in order to examine it and certify the result to the court. References to compute, &c. are frequently made to the masters of the Courts of Common Law. As to reference to arbitration, see ARBITRATION.

Referendary, one to whose decision anything is referred.

Referendum, a note addressed by an ambassador to his own government touching a proposition, as to which he is without power and instructions.

Reform Act, 2 Wm. IV. c. 45.

Reformatory Schools. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 87; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 109; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 55.

Refresher, a reviving fee.

Refreshment Houses, the Licensing of. See 23 Vict. c. 27; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 107.

Refund, to pay back.

Refusal, where one has, by law, a right and power of having or doing something of advantage, and he declines it.

Refusing to bury the dead by those whose duty it is to do so. It is an offence punishable by the temporal courts (independently of spiritual censures), on indictment or information. As to the interment of corpses cast on the seashore, see 48 Geo. III. c. 75.

Refusing to execute a deed. See EXECUTION OF DEED.

Refusing to institute a clerk. When a clerk is presented, the bishop may refuse to institute him upon many grounds, as: (1) If the patron be excommunicated, and remain in contempt forty days; or, (2) if the clerk be unfit, either as to person, or as to his faith or morals, or for want of learning. If the refusal is for heresy, schism, want of learning, or other matter of ecclesiastical cognizance, there the bishop must give notice to the patron of such his cause of refusal, at least if he be a layman, for in that case he is presumably unaware of his disability. But if the objection be a temporal one, the bishop is not bound to give such notice.

If an action be brought by the patron against the bishop, for refusing his clerk, the bishop must assign the cause.—3 Step. Com. 28, 75. See INSTITUTION.

Refusing to pay money decreed by Chancery. Consol. Ord. 1860, xxix., r. 6; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. If payment be not made within one month from the entry of the decree or order, the person to whom it was ordered to be made may sue out one or more writs of fieri facias or elegit, of the same nature with the writs issued, under those names, by the courts of common law.—Smi. Eq. Pr. 155.

Refusing to serve a public office without lawful excuse or exemption is a common-law misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Refusing to take the oath of allegiance. See PRÆMUNIRE (7); and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, s. 3.

Regale episcoporum, the temporal rights and privileges of a bishop.

Regale, the prerogatives of monarchy.

Regale fish, whales and sturgeons.

Regalia, the royal rights of a sovereign, which the civilians reckon to be six; viz. power of judicature, of life and death, of war and peace, masterless goods, as waifs, estrays, &c. assessments and minting of money. See MAJORA and MINORA REGALIA.

Regalia facere, to do homage or fealty to the sovereign by a bishop when he is invested with the regalia.

Regality, a territorial jurisdiction in Scotland granted with land from the Crown.

Regard, Court of, a tribunal held every third year, for the lawing or expeditation of dogs, to prevent them from chasing deer.

Regard of the Forest, the oversight or inspection of it, or the office and province of the regarder, who is to go through the whole forest, and every bailiwick in it, before the holding of the sessions of the forest, or justice-seat, to see and inquire after trespasses, and for the survey of dogs.

Regardant Villein, or Regardant to the Manor, an ancient servant or retainer annexed to the mannor or land, who did the base services within the manor.—1 Inst. 120.

Regarder of a Forest [regardator forestæ, Lat.], an ancient officer of the forest, whose duty it was to take a view of the forest-hunts, and to inquire concerning trespasses, offences, &c.

Rege inconsulto, a writ issued from the sovereign to the judges, not to proceed in a cause which may prejudice the Crown, until advised.

Regency, a temporary monarchy.

Regent, one invested with vicarious royalty. See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 52.

Reges dicuntur clerici.—Dav. 4.—(Kings are called clerks.)

Reges, sacro oleo uncti, sunt spiritualis jurisdictionis capaces.—5 Co. Eccle. L.—Anointed kings are capable of spiritual jurisdiction.)

Regest [fr. registum, Lat.], a register.—Milton.

Regia dignitas est indivisibilis, et quælibet alia derivativa dignitas est similiter indivisibilis.—4 Inst. 243.—(The kingly power is indivisible, and every other derivative power is similarly indivisible.)

Regiam Majestatem, a collection of the ancient laws of Scotland. It is said to have been compiled by order of David I. King of Scotland, who reigned from A.D. 1124 to 1153.—Hale's Hist. 271.

Regicide, the murderer of a sovereign.

Regio assensu, a writ whereby the sovereign gives his assent to the election of a bishop.—Reg. Orig. 294.

Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis.—7 Inst. 193.—(The whole earth is ruled after the example of a king.)

Register [fr. gîter, Fr., to lodge] a public book serving to enter and record memoirs, acts, and minutes, to be had recourse to occasionally, for the justifying of matters of facts.

By several Acts of Parliament, all deeds and wills concerning estates within the north, east, and west ridings of York, or within the town and county of Kingston-upon-Hull, or within the county of Middlesex, or the Bedford Levels, are directed to be registered. A memorial of a will should be registered within six months after the death of the devisor if he die within Great Britain, or within the space of three years after his death, if he die upon the sea, or in parts beyond the seas. Wills registered within the allowed time will prevail over even a prior registered conveyance.

If the devisee of an estate within the east or west ridings of York or Kingston-upon-Hull, be disabled from exhibiting a memorial within the time limited, by the suppression of the will or other inevitable difficulty, then a memorial entered of such impediment within six months after the death of such devisor who shall die within Great Britain, or within three years after the decease of such person who shall die upon the sea, or beyond the seas, and a memorial of such will also, registered within six months after the removal of such impediment, will protect the devisees against any purchaser subsequently to the will.

But as to estates in the north riding of York, then in case of the concealment or suppression of any will or devise, any purchaser shall not be disturbed or defeated in his purchase unless the will be actually registered within three years after the death of the devisor.

As to estates in the county of Middlesex, it is provided that an entry of the impediment within two years after the death of any devisor who shall die in Great Britain, or within four years after the decease of such person who shall die upon the sea or beyond the seas, and a registry of a memorial of the will within six months after the removal of the impediment shall be good. But no concealed will is to affect a purchaser unless it be registered within five years after the death of the testator.

No judgment, statute, or recognizance (other than such as shall be entered into in the name and upon the proper account of the Crown) shall bind estates in Middlesex, but from the time that a memorial thereof shall be duly registered. As to estates in the east and west ridings of York and Kingston-upon-Hull, the registry of judgments, statutes, or recognizances within thirty days after the acknowledging or signing thereof, shall bind all the lands of the defendant at the time of such acknowledgment or signing, but in the north riding the time is limited to twenty days. The appointment of an assignee to an insolvent's estate had to be registered. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 46. Deeds of appointment must be registered; but a legacy charged on land needs not registry. The non-registry of a lease is not cured by registering an assignment in which such lease is recited.

None of the acts extend to copyhold-estates or to leases at rack rents, or not exceeding twenty-one years, where the actual possession and occupation go along with the lease, or to any of the chambers in Serjeants' Inn, the Inns of Court, or the Inns of Chancery.

A person having the legal estate, as a mortgagee, and advancing more money, without notice of a second mortgage duly registered, shall hold against the second mortgage till he is satisfied all the money he has advanced.

A person purchasing without notice, and obtaining the legal estate, shall not be prejudiced by a prior equitable incumbrance, which was duly registered previously to his purchase.

A person buying an estate with notice of a prior incumbrance not registered, shall in equity be bound by such incumbrance, although he has at law obtained a priority by registering his deed.

A purchaser from a devisee should not complete his contract till the will is duly registered; for if any person were to purchase of the heir at law bonâ fide, and without notice of the will, he would be preferred to the purchaser from the devisee. But if the vendor be both heir at law and devisee, the non-registry of the will is immaterial; for if he sell to any subsequent purchaser, it must either be in the character of heir at law or devisee. If he sell in this character, the second purchaser must have notice of the will; if he contract in that, the first purchaser has already procured the legal estate.

If the vendor claim a leasehold estate, either as executor or legatee, the purchaser need not insist upon the testator's will being registered, because no subsequent purchaser can procure a title without notice of the will. Letters of administration are never registered.

Every memorial of a deed or conveyance is directed by the acts to be under the hand and seal of some, or one, of the grantors or grantees, his or their heirs, or executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees, attested by two witnesses, one whereof to be one of the witnesses to the execution of the deed; which witness shall upon his oath, before the registrar, prove the signing and sealing of the memorial, and the execution of the deed mentioned in such memorial.

Every memorial must contain, first, the day of the month and year when the deed, &c. bears date, and the names and additions of all the parties to it, and of the devisor or testatrix of a will, and all the witnesses to such deed, &c. and the places of their abode; and, secondly, the houses, manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, contained in such deed, &c. and the names of the parishes, &c. where any such estates lie that are comprised in or affected by such deed, &c. in such manner as the same are explained or mentioned in such deeds, &c. or to the same effect. See 3 Sug. V. and P. 345, 10th ed. and St. Leon. V. and P. 598, 13th ed. See TRANSFER OF LAND ACT.

Register of Patents, a book kept at the Specification-Office for the public use. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 34.

Register of Pauper-servants, under 16. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 11.

Register of Writs, an old book in which new forms of original writs were entered. The Register of Writs is said to be the oldest book in the law: a character which may, in a great measure, be true, but should not be allowed without some consideration. It is not more certain than extraordinary that the forms of writs were settled in their substance and language very nearly in the manner in which they were drawn ever after. However, this uniformity was not so exact as that the writs published and used in the reign of Henry VIII. were all of them identically the same with those used at the first origin of this invention, in the reign of Henry II. It is not to be wondered that there should be a difference in these forms at their infancy, and at this advanced state of our law, but it is extremely remarkable that the difference should be so small. 4 Reeves, 426; Co. Litt. 16 b, 37 b, 159 a.

Registrarius, a notary or registrar.

Registrar, or Registrary, an officer whose business is to write and keep a register; also a functionary of the Court of Probate or a County Court. As to the duties of registrars in Chancery, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 21.

Registrar-General, an officer appointed by the Crown under the Great Seal, to whom, subject to such regulations as shall be made by a principal secretary of state, the general superintendence of the whole system of registration of births, deaths, and marriages is entrusted.—6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, ss. 2, 5.

Registrar-General of Seamen. To secure the great object of affording general information from time to time as to the state of our mercantile marine, it is provided that there shall be in the port of London a 'General Register and Record Office for Seamen,' under the management of this officer. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 271–279; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 4.

Registrar of Attornies and Solicitors. His duty is to keep an alphabetical list or roll of all attornies and solicitors, and to issue certificates as to persons who have been duly admitted and enrolled; and the duties of this office are committed to the 'Incorporated Law Society,' until some person shall be appointed in their room, by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 21.

Registrar of Friendly Societies. Any persons wishing to establish a society of this description may make rules for the purpose; but two copies of the rules must be made out and transmitted to this officer, and when certified by him as conformable to law and to the Act, one of them is to be returned to the society, and the other he is to keep in such manner as shall be from time to time directed by one of the principal secretaries of state. Upon being so certified, the rules take immediate effect, and are binding in point of law on all the parties concerned.—18 & 19 Vict. c. 63.

Registrar of the Privy Council. As to his examining witnesses and taking affidavits, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 85.

Registration, the act of inserting in a register.

Registration of Aliens Act, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 11.

Registration of Births and Deaths Ireland Act, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 11.

Registration of Copyright. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45 authorizes, in every case of copyright, the registration of the title of the proprietor at Stationers' Hall; and provides that, without previous registration, no action shall be commenced, though an omission to register is not otherwise to effect the copyright itself.

Registration of Electors. It is requisite that a voter in the election of members of Parliament should be duly registered before he exercises the franchise. See 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 26, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 2; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102; and as to Scotland, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 58.

Registration of Joint-Stock Companies. See The Companies Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89.

Registration of Marriages Ireland Act, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 90.

Registration of Parish Apprentices. See 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 5; 8 & 9 Wm. III. c. 30; 18 Geo. III. c. 47; 56 Geo. III. c. 139; 42 Geo. III. c. 46; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, ss. 12, 13.

Registration and Protection of Designs Act. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100, amended by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 73; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 65; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 104; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 8; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 6; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 12.

Registrum Brevium, a register of writs, which see.

Registry, in commercial navigation, the registration or enrolment of ships at the Custom-house, so as to entitle them to be classed among, and to enjoy the privileges of, British-built ships.

The registry of ships appears to have been introduced into this country by the Navigation Act, 12 Car. II. c. 18, A.D. 1660; several provisions were made with respect to it by the 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 22, and the whole was reduced into a system by the 27 Geo. III. c. 19.

The great, and perhaps the only original object of the registration of ships, was to facilitate the exclusion of foreign ships from those departments in which they were prohibited from engaging by the navigation laws, by affording a ready means of distinguishing such as were really British. It has also been considered advantageous to individuals, by preventing the fraudulent assignment of property in ships; but Lord Tenterden has observed, in reference to this supposed advantage, that 'the instances in which fair and honest transactions are rendered unavailable through a negligent want of compliance with the forms directed by these and other statutes requiring a public register of conveyances, make the expediency of all such regulations, considered with reference to private benefit only, a matter of question and controversy.'—Law of Shipping, pt. 1, c. ii.

The existing regulations as to the registry of ships are embodied in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, which provides that no ship shall be deemed a British ship unless she belong wholly to owners who are of one of the following descriptions:—Natural-born subjects, persons made denizens, or persons naturalized, either by or pursuant to any Act of Parliament, or the proper legislative authority in some British possession; or bodies corporate established under and subject to the laws of, and having their principal place of business in the United Kingdom or some British possession (sec. 18). And even as to the capacity of the first three descriptions of persons to be owners, some restrictive conditions are contained in the Act. It is also provided that every British ship (subject to the exceptions mentioned in s. 19) must be registered, and that unless registered she shall not be recognised as a British ship, so as to be entitled to any of the advantages or protection usually enjoyed by British ships, or to use the national flag, or assume the national character. This registration may be made in the United Kingdom at any port approved by the commissioners of customs for the registry of ships, and is to be made with the collector or comptroller, or other principal officer of customs, who is to be deemed registrar for the purposes of this Act; and the port at which any ship is registered is thereafter to be considered as that to which she belongs, until the registry is transferred to another (18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 12). It is further provided, with respect to the registration, that it must comprise, inter alia, the name of the ship, which is incapable of being afterwards changed, and the names and descriptions of the owners. But in connection with this registration of the owners, the following points require attention:—(1) The property in any ship is always to be divided for this purpose into sixty-four shares. (2) No person is to be registered as owner of any fractional part of a share. (3) The individuals registered as owners are not to exceed thirty-two in the whole, except that any number not exceeding five may be registered as joint-owners of any share. (4) The property in the ship or its shares, so far as regards the power of making a valid title as owner to a purchaser, is vested exclusively in the registered owners; though any number of other persons may be beneficially or equitably interested, and may enforce their rights in that capacity, in case of breach of trust, by application to the Court of Chancery. A registered ship, or any share therein, when disposed of to a person qualified to be the owner of a British ship, shall be transferred by a bill of sale under seal according to a form prescribed; upon which the name of the transferee shall be entered on the register book; and a registered ship, or any share therein, may be mortgaged by instrument in a form prescribed for that purpose, and the mortgage shall be entered in the register book; and where there are several mortgagees, their respective priorities are to be, in all cases, according to the time at which each security was registered, and not the time at which it was executed (ss. 30–100, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91).—3 Step. Com. 261; McCull. Comm. Dict.

Regius Professor, a royal professor, a reader of lectures in the universities. Henry VIII. founded in each of our universities five professorships, viz. of Divinity, Greek, Hebrew, Law, and Physic.

Regnant, reigning, having regal authority. See QUEEN.

Regni populi, a name given to the people of Surrey and Sussex, and on the sea-coasts of Hampshire.—Blount.

Regnum ecclesiasticum, the ecclesiastical kingdom.

Regnum non est divisibile.—Co Litt. 165.—(The kingdom is not divisible.)

Regrating, buying corn, &c., in any market, and selling it again in or near to the same place. It was illegal, but is now no longer so. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24.

Regress, Letters of, they were granted by the superior of lands mortgaged to the wadsettor or mortgagor. Their object was this: by the wadset or mortgage, the mortgagor was completely divested, and when he redeemed, he appeared to claim an entry from the superior as a stranger, and the superior was no more bound to receive the mortgagor than he would have been forced to receive any third party; to remedy this, letters of regress were granted by the superior under which he became bound to re-admit the mortgagor at any time when he should demand entry.—Scotch Law. See 20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Regulæ generales, General Rules which the courts promulgate from time to time for the regulation of their practice.

Regula peccatis quæ pœnas irrogat æquas.—Gilb. 213.—(The rule which sets equal penalties on sins.)

Regular clergy, the monks, who lived secundum regulas of their respective houses or societies.

Regular deposit, one where the thing deposited must be returned.

Regulars, those who profess and follow a certain rule of life (regula), and observe the three approved vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

Regulariter non valet pactum de re meâ non alienanda.—Co. Litt. 223.—(Regularly a compact, not to alienate my property, is not binding.)

Rehabere facias seisinam, a judicial writ which lay when the sheriff in the habere facias seisinam had delivered more than he ought.—Reg. Judic. 13.

Rehabilitate, to restore a delinquent to former rank, privilege, or right; to qualify again; to restore a forfeited right.

Rehearing. If either party is dissatisfied with a decree or decretal order in Chancery, he may apply to have the cause reheard before the judge pronouncing the same. The petition for rehearing should be presented after the decree is passed and entered, and before it is enrolled. The petition must be signed by two counsel, who also certify that it is a proper case for rehearing. A deposit of 20*l.* for costs must be made.

By Consol. Ord. 1860, xxv., r. 14, any defendant waiving all objection to the order to take the bill pro confesso, and submitting to pay such costs as the court may direct, may, before enrolment of the decree, have the cause reheard upon the merits stated in the bill, the petition of rehearing being signed by counsel as other petitions of rehearing.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 478.

Reif [fr. refian, Sax.], robbery.—Cowel.

Re-insurance, or Re-assurance, a contract by which a first insurer relieves himself from the risks which he has undertaken, and devolves them upon other insurers, called reinsurers or re-assurers, but see 19 Geo. II. c. 37.

Reipublicæ interest voluntates defunctorum effectum sortiri.—(It concerns the state that the wills of the dead should have their effect.)

Reissuable notes, bank-notes which may again be put into circulation.

Rejoinder, a defendant's answer to a plaintiff's replication, which must be delivered within four days after notice, unless the defendant is under terms of 'rejoining gratis,' which means rejoining within four days from the delivery of the replication without a notice to rejoin, or a demand of a rejoinder. It does not apply to a joinder in demurrer, therefore, on a demurrer to a plea, the defendant is entitled to four days to join in it from the service of a notice to do so. As to rejoining several matters, and rejoining and demurring together, see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 302.

Relation, where two different times or other things are accounted as one, and by some act done, the thing subsequent is said to take effect by relation from the time preceding. Thus letters of administration relate to the intestate's death, and not to the time when they were granted. See FORFEITURE.

Relatio est fictio juris et intenta ad unum.—3 Co. 28—(Relation is a fiction of law, and is intent to one point.)

Relatio semper fiat ut valeat dispositio, et quando ad duas res referri potest dispositio ita quod secundum unam vitiatur et secundum alteram utilis est, tunc facienda est relatio ut valeat dispositio.—6 Co. 76.—(Let reference be made always in such a manner that the disposition may avail; and when a disposition is referable to two things, so that by one it is bad, and by the other is good, then let the reference be made to that by which the disposition may avail.)

Relative powers, those relating to realty.

Relativorum cognito uno, cognoscitur et alterum.—Cro. Jac. 539.—(Of relatives one being known, the other is also known.)

Relator, a rehearser, teller, or informer; also, a plaintiff to an information in Chancery, where the rights of the Crown are not immediately concerned, who is responsible for costs; he must give the solicitor a written authority to file the information.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 11. Also a person who brings an information in the nature of a quo warranto. See 2 Selw. N. P. 1178.

Release [fr. relaxatio, Lat.], a gift, discharge, or renunciation of a right of action; also a common law conveyance, the operative verb in which is 'release;' hence the name. It operates or enures in five modes:—

(a) By passing an estate (mitter l'estate), as where a joint-tenant or coparcener conveys his estate to his co-joint-tenant or co-parcener. In consequence of the privity between such parties, a fee-simple will pass without any words of limitation. Tenants in common, however, cannot thus release to one another, since they have distinct interests in the property.

(b) By transferring a right (mitter le droit), as in the case of a disseisee discharging his right to a disseisor, his heir, or grantee. Words of limitation are not necessary, since the subject of transfer is a simple right, which once discharged is for ever extinguished, and not an estate, which may be qualified or restricted.

The difference between this and the previous mode is, that the former passes an estate, where a privity exists between the parties; this passes only a right, in the absence of privity.

(c) By extinguishment, as the lord releasing his seignorial rights to his tenant, or a life-tenant having conveyed a greater estate than he owns, the expectant releasing his right to the tenant's grantee. A release of all demands extinguishes all actions and titles, and is the amplest discharge that can be given.

(d) By enlarging a particular estate into an estate commensurate with that of the person releasing; but a privity of estate must at the time exist between the releasor and the releasee, who must have an estate actually vested in him susceptible of enlargement.

(e) By entry and feoffment, as a disseisee releasing to one of two disseisors, who then becomes as solely seised as if the disseisee had entered upon the property, put an end to the disseisin, and then enfeoffed such disseisor.

Releasee, the person to whom a release is made.

Releaser, or Releasor, the maker of a release.

Relegation, exile; judicial banishment.

Abjuration is forswearing the realm for ever; relegation is banishment for a time only.—Co. Litt. 133.

In Rome, relegation was a less severe punishment than deportation, in that the relegated person did not thereby lose the rights of a Roman citizen, nor those of his family, as the authority of a father over his children, &c.—Encyc. Lond.; Sand. Just. 144.

Relevant, applying to the matter in question; affording something to the purpose.

Relict, a widow.

Relictâ verificatione, where a judgment is confessed by cognovit actionem after plea pleaded, and the plea is withdrawn, it is called a confession or cognovit actionem relictâ verificatione.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 931, 935.

Formerly, a defendant who had pleaded a bad plea, which was demurred to, could withdraw it by entering a relictâ verificatione, upon which he would not have to pay costs until the plaintiff obtained judgment in the action; but by Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, r. 8, 'a defendant shall not be at liberty to waive his plea, or enter a relictâ verificatione after a demurrer without leave of the court or a judge, unless by consent of the plaintiff or his attorney.'—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 297.

Reliction, the sudden recession of the sea from land. See DERELICTION.

Relief, legal remedy for wrongs, &c.; charitable assistance.

In the feudal law a payment made to the lord by the tenant coming into possession of an estate held under him. Abolished with other feudal grievances.

Religion, Offences against; they are,

(1) Apostasy.
(2) Heresy.
(3) Reviling the ordinances of the church.
(4) Blasphemy.
(5) Profane swearing.
(6) Conjuration or witchcraft.
(7) Religious imposture.
(8) Simony.
(9) Profanation of the Lord's day.
(10) Drunkenness.
(11) Lewdness.

Religious houses, places set apart for pious uses, such as monasteries, churches, hospitals, and all other places where charity was extended to the relief of the poor and orphans, or for the use or exercise of religion.

Religious impostors, those who falsely pretend an extraordinary commission from heaven, or terrify and abuse the people with false denunciations of judgment; punishable with fine, imprisonment, and infamous corporal punishment.—4 Step. Com. 291.

Religious men [fr. religiosi], such as entered into some monastery or convent, there to live devoutly. They were held to be civiliter mortui.

Relinquishment, a forsaking, abandoning, or giving over.

Reliqua, the remainder or debt which a person finds himself debtor in upon the balancing or liquidation of an account. Hence reliquary, the debtor of a reliqua; as also a person who only pays piece-meal.—Encyc. Lond.

Reliques, remains, such as the bones, &c., of saints, preserved with great veneration as sacred memorials; they are forbidden to be used or brought into England.—3 Jac. I. c. 26.

Relocation, a reletting or renewal of a lease; a tacit relocation is permitting a tenant to hold over without any new agreement.

Remoto impedimento emergit actio.—5 Co. 76.—(The impediment being removed, the action revives.)

Rem, information in, when any goods are supposed to become the property of the Crown, and no one appears to claim them or to dispute its title, as anciently, in the case of treasure-trove, wrecks, waifs, and estrays seized by the Crown's officers. After such seizure an information was usually filed in the Exchequer, and thereupon a proclamation was made for the owner (if any) to come in and claim the effects, and at the same time there issued a commission of appraisement to value the goods, after the return of which, and a second proclamation had, if no claimant appeared, the goods were supposed derelict, and condemned to the use of the Crown; and when in later times forfeitures of the goods themselves, as well as personal penalties on the parties, were inflicted by Act of Parliament for transgressions against the laws of the customs and excise, the same process was adopted in order to secure such forfeited goods to the public use, though the offender had escaped justice. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, as to the Crown paying costs.—4 Step. Com. 83.

Remainder [fr. remanentia, Lat.], that expectant portion, remnant, or residue of interest which, on the creation of a particular estate, is at the same time limited over to another, who is to enjoy it after the determination of such particular estate.

It may be limited in inheritable or non-inheritable freehold estates, but not strictly and technically, in chattels real or personal, although these may be limited over after a previous limitation of a partial interest in them. It may be limited by way of use (which is in practice the usual method) as well as by a conveyance deriving its effect from the common law.

In the same land there may at the same time be an estate in possession, and one estate or several estates in remainder, and an estate in reversion.

When the estate in possession is determined, the estate in remainder, if there be any, otherwise the estate in reversion, will become an estate in possession, with priority as to the estates in remainder, when there are several, according to the order in which they are limited.

An interest in possession, and an interest in remainder or reversion, are several parts of the same estate. When there are a particular estate and a remainder, the several limitations give distinct interests to the persons to whom these limitations are made.

These interests (different as they are in their nature) and also a reversion, are with reference to the person by whom the limitations are made, and the connection and relative situation of the tenants, several parts of the same estate.

Estates are said to be in remainder or reversion, according to the relative situation they bear to each other.

The interest which, as to one man, is an estate in remainder, may, as to another person, be an estate in reversion. Thus if A. leases to B. for life, with remainder to C. in fee, and C. leases to D. for life; the estate of C. is still a remainder in reference to the estate of B., but in reference to the estate of D. it is a reversion.

So an estate which, as to one person, is an estate in possession or a particular estate, may, as to another person, be an estate in reversion; and consequently there may be two reversions in the same land. As if A. lease to B. for life, B. has the possession, and A. the reversion, as between themselves; and if B. lease to C., then, as between B. and C., C. has the possession, and B. a reversion; hence the doctrine of privity of estate.

A remainder does not, like a reversion, arise by operation of law, but is always created by act of parties. It may be granted over, charged, devised, or barred by a prior tenant in tail. Mr. Burton (Comp. p. 8) thus indicates the difference between a reversion and a remainder.

If the gift were simply 'to you for your life,' the reversion in fee-simple would remain in the feoffor. But this consequence would be varied, if the gift were, 'to you for your life, and after your decease to A. and his heirs;' or 'to you for twenty-one years, and, subject to that estate, to A. and his heirs;' or 'to you and the heirs of your body' (which would constitute an estate tail), 'and upon your decease, and failure of your issue, to A. and his heirs.' In any of these three cases, A. would take an estate in fee-simple, giving him a right to the possession of the land upon the death of the feoffee, or the expiration of twenty-one years, or the extinction of the feoffee and his issue. But this estate is not called a reversion, as the land does not revert or return to the feoffor, but a remainder, being the residue or remnant of the whole estate conveyed, after subtracting the feoffee's estate; which last, in relation to the remainder, as in this, or to the reversion, as in the former case, is called the particular estate.

The rule against perpetuities does not apply to remainders:—1st, because every remainder which is contingent must vest in interest during the continuance of the particular estate or the very instant it determines; and, 2ndly, because the owner of every vested remainder, being an estate of inheritance, and which must be an estate tail if there are remainders over, has the power, when in possession, of barring all subsequent remainders.

Remainders are of three kinds:—(1) vested or executed; (2) contingent or executory; and (3) cross.

The seven following rules affecting remainders should be observed:—

(1) There must be a present or particular estate created, which, if the remainder be vested, must be, at least, for years, but an interesse termini would be sufficient; or, if the remainder be contingent, it must be an estate of freehold, expressly limited, or arising by a resulting, or implied use, in order to give such a remainder existence. A chattel interest will not support a contingent remainder; since, while the contingency is in suspense, there must be an ulterior estate of freehold vested in some person, for otherwise there would be no vested freehold at all, which the law will not allow. There is not, however, any necessity for a preceding freehold to support a contingent remainder for years; for such a remainder not amounting to a freehold, no freehold estate appears requisite to pass out of the grantor in order to give effect to a chattel remainder.

(2) The particular estate, and the remainders must be created by the same deed or instrument, but a will and codicil may be fairly denominated the same instrument, for they take effect at the same time; and a deed giving a power, and the appointment exercising such power, are esteemed the same deed.

(3) The remainder must vest in the grantee during the particular estate, or the very instant it determines. But an estate limited on a contingency may fail as to one part, and take effect as to another, wherever the preceding estate is in several persons in common or in severalty; for the particular tenant of one part may die before the contingency, and the particular tenant of another part may survive it. Posthumous children are capable of taking in remainder in the same manner as if they had been born in their father's lifetime, and the remainder vests in them, while yet in ventre matris.—10 & 11 Wm. III. c. 16.

(4) A contingent remainder must be limited, upon a legal event, to some one that may by common possibility be in being, at or before the determination of the particular estate.

(5) It is not necessary for the support of a contingent remainder that the preceding estate of freehold continue in the actual seisin of the rightful tenant; it is sufficient that there subsists a right to such preceding estate at the time the remainder should vest, provided such right be a present subsisting right of entry preceding the contingency, and not a right of action. It is necessary to distinguish between a right of entry and a right of action. If A. is disseised by B., then, while the possession continues in B., it is a mere possession unsupported by any presumption of right; and A. may restore his possession by an entry on the land, without any previous action. If A. enter and B. defend his possession, and the question is tried in a possessory action, the gist of it must be, who has the better title to the possession, and A. must necessarily recover. Thus far the party disseised, even during the disseisin, is considered in law to be the rightful tenant. But, if B. continue in the possession of the estate till his decease, the law, at his decease, casts the possession upon his heir; thus, upon B.'s decease, his heir acquires the possession by act of law, and his title, though immediately derived from a person who himself acquired it by wrong, is so far respected in law, that A. cannot restore his possession by entry, and can only recover it by action. This removes A.'s title one degree farther than while he could restore his possession by entry, and is therefore said to reduce him to a right of action, and it is called a right of action in contradistinction to a right of entry.

(6) Where a contingent remainder is limited to the use of several, who do not all become capable at the same time, notwithstanding it vests in the person first becoming capable, yet it shall devest as to the proportions of the persons afterwards becoming capable, before the determination of the particular estate.

(7) If a condition be annexed to a particular estate, making it void on a given event, and a remainder be limited to take effect, not only on the determination of the particular estate, but on the destruction of that estate, by the effect of the condition, the remainder is void; the common law rule being that a stranger shall not take advantage of a condition, but only the grantor or his heirs. But if the condition for defeating the prior estate be to operate on one event, and the remainder be to arise on another and totally different event, the remainder will not be void, but the particular estate will be discharged from the condition. If A. make a feoffment to B., a widow, for life, provided that if she marry again then her estate shall cease, and immediately after her death or second marriage the estate shall enure to B. in fee, this is a bad remainder; because it is limited to take effect, not only on the determination of the widow's estate, but also on the event which is mentioned in the condition to cut that estate short—namely, her second marriage; but if the remainder had been introduced without the words in italics, then it would have been a good contingent remainder, and the condition would be viewed as surplusage.—Fearne's Cont. Rem. 270. So, if the limitation had been to the widow durante viduitate, the remainder would have been good; as then her death or second marriage would have been the natural period for the determination of her estate. But if the remainder had been introduced by the words, 'from and immediately after the determination of that estate,' it would be liable to objection, on the ground that the remainder-man would be taking advantage of the condition, unless the word 'determination' could be construed to refer to the death only of the widow, and not to her second marriage.

But such a remainder is supported, as a conditional limitation in wills and conveyances under the Statute of Uses.

A remainder is to commence when the particular estate is, from its very nature, to determine; it is, as it were, a continuance of the same estate; it is a part of the same whole. A conditional limitation is not a continuance of the estate first limited, but is entirely a different and separate estate. It is not to commence on the determination of the first, but the first is to determine when the latter commences. It is the commencement of the latter which rescinds and destroys the former; and not the ceasing of the former which gives existence to the latter. The particular estate and remainders are, in fact, as the very terms imply, but one and the same estate. The estate first appointed, and the conditional limitations, are separate and distinct estates. See CONTINGENT REMAINDER, CROSS-REMAINDERS, VESTED REMAINDER.

Remainder-man, a person entitled to an expectant estate.

Remand, to re-commit or send back.

Remanent pro defectu emptorum (they remain unsold for want of buyers). A sheriff's return to a writ of fi. fa.

Remanet, the name given to a cause the trial of which has been postponed from one sittings to another. A new notice of trial is necessary when a cause has been made a remanet at the assizes, but not when it has been made a remanet from one sittings to another, or has been put off by order of Nisi Prius.

Where the cause is made a remanet, the costs incurred in bringing up witnesses, &c. are allowed to the party ultimately prevailing.

Remedial statutes, those which are made to supply such defects, and abridge such superfluities in the common law, as arise either from the general imperfection of all human laws, from change of time and circumstances, from the mistakes and unadvised determinations of unlearned judges, or from any other cause. This being effected either by enlarging the common law where it is too narrow and circumscribed, or by restraining it where it is too lax and luxuriant, has occasioned a division of remedial Acts of Parliament into enlarging and restraining statutes.

Remedy, the legal means to recover a right; also, a certain allowance to the master of the mint, for deviation from the standard weight and fineness of coins.—Encyc. Lond.

Remembrancer, an officer of the Exchequer, who reminds the lord treasurer and the justices of that court of such things as are to be called on and dealt in for the benefit of the Crown.— 57 Geo. III. c. 60; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 86; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21. Also, an officer of corporations, &c.

Remise, to surrender or return; to release.

Remission, a pardon from the Crown, passed under the great seal; a release.

Remissius imperanti melius paretur.—3 Inst. 233.—(A man commanding not too strictly is better obeyed.)

Remitment, the act of sending back to custody; an annulment.

Remittance, money sent by one person to another, either in specie, bill of exchange, cheque, or otherwise.

Remittee, the person to whom a remittance is sent.

Remitter, where he who has the right of entry in lands, but is out of possession, obtains afterwards the possession of the lands by some subsequent, and, of course, defective title; in this case he is remitted or sent back, by operation of law, to his ancient and more certain title. The possession which he has gained by a bad title is ipso facto annexed to his own inherent good one; and his defeasable estate is utterly defeated and annulled by the instantaneous act of law, without his participation or consent. As if A. disseise B., i. e. turn him out of possession, and afterwards demise the land to B. (without deed), for a term of years, by which B. enters, this entry is a remitter to B., who is in of his former and surer estate. But if A. had demised to him for years by deed indented, or by matter of record, there B. would not have been remitted. For if a man, by deed indented, take a lease of his own lands, it shall bind him to the rents and covenants, because a man never can be allowed to affirm that his own deed is ineffectual, since that is the greatest security on which men rely in all manner of contracting. The same law, if it had been by matter of record, for that is of its own nature uncontrollable evidence, which a man cannot be allowed to controvert.—3 Step. Com. 376, 377 n. Also, a person who sends a remittance.

Remitting Cases to Courts abroad. By the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, courts in one part of her Majesty's dominions are empowered to remit a case for the opinion of a court in any other part thereof on any point on which the law of such other part is different, from that of the part in which the court is situate. And by the 24 Vict. c. 11, any superior court within her Majesty's dominions may remit a case to a court of any foreign state with which Her Majesty may have made a convention for that purpose, for the ascertainment of the law of such state.

Remittitur damna. Where a jury gives greater damages than a plaintiff has declared for, the mistake may be rectified by entering a remittitur for the excess; or, if a plaintiff have signed judgment for the greater sum, the court will give him leave to amend it, by entering a remittitur for the excess, even in a subsequent term and after error brought. The damages are usually remitted in ejectment and replevin where judgment is signed by confession or default.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1504.

Remittitur of record. Formerly when a writ of error, in the Exchequer Chamber, abated, or was discontinued, the transcript must have been remitted, and a remittitur entered, before a defendant could sue out execution; but now this is no longer necessary, for the record remains in the court below, and execution is, therefore, in all cases, now issued by and out of that court.—H. T. 4 Wm. IV. r. 16. See Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 574.

Removal of goods to prevent distress. See 9 Anne, c. 14, and 11 Geo. II. c. 19.

Renant, or Reniant [fr. negans, Lat.], denying.

Rencounter, a sudden meeting; as opposed to a duel, which is deliberate.

Render, to yield, give again, or return.

Certain things lie in render, i. e. must be rendered or answered by the tenant as rents, heriots, and other services.

Renewal, a change of something old for something new; a reviving of a writ or process.

Renounce, to give up a right. An executor who declines to take probate of the will of his testator is said to renounce probate. Where any person after 1st January, 1858, renounces probate of the will of which he is appointed executor, or one of the executors, the rights of such person in respect of the executorship shall wholly cease, and the representation to the testator, and the administration of his effects shall, and may, without any further renunciation go, devolve, and be committed in like manner as if such person had not been appointed executor.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 79.

Whenever an executor appointed in a will survives the testator, but dies without having taken probate, and whenever an executor named in a will is cited to take probate, and does not appear to such citation, the right of such person in respect of the executorship shall wholly cease, and the representation to the testator, and the administration of his effects shall, and may, without any further renunciation, go, devolve, and be committed in like manner as if such person had not been appointed executor.—21 & 22 Vict. c. 94, s. 16.

Renovant, renewing.

Rent [fr. reditus, Lat.], a certain profit issuing yearly out of lands and tenements corporeal; it may be regarded as of a twofold nature:—first, as something issuing out of the land, as a compensation for the possession during the term; and, secondly, as an acknowledgment made by the tenant to the lord of his fealty or tenure. It must always be a profit, yet there is no necessity that it should be, as it usually is, a sum of money; for spurs, capons, horses, corn, and other matters, may be, and occasionally are, rendered by way of rent; it may also consist in services or manual operations, as to plough so many acres of ground, and the like; which services, in the eye of the law, are profits. The profit must be certain, or that which may be reduced to a certainty by either party; it must issue yearly, though it may be reserved every second, third, or fourth year; it must issue out of the thing granted, and not be part of the land or thing itself.

There are several kinds of rents, viz.: —

(1) Rent-service, so called because it has some corporal service incident to it, as, at the least, fealty.

(2) Rent-charge, where the owner of the rent has no future interest or reversion in the land. It is usually created by deed or will, and is accompanied with powers of distress and entry. The release from a rent-charge of part of the hereditaments charged therewith, shall not extinguish the whole rent-charge, but shall operate only to bar the right to recover any part of the rent-charge out of the hereditaments released, without prejudice nevertheless to the rights of all persons interested in the hereditaments remaining unreleased, and not concurring in or confirming the release.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 10.

(3) Fee farm rent, one issuing out of an estate in fee, of at least one-fourth of the value of the lands, at the time of its reservation.

(4) Rent-seck, a barren rent, which is in effect nothing more than a rent reserved by deed or will, but without any clause of distress.

(5) Rents of assize, the certain established rents of the freeholders and ancient copyholders of a manor, which cannot be departed from. Those of the freeholders are frequently called:

(a) Chief-rents, and both sorts are indifferently denominated:

(b) Quit-rents, because thereby the tenant goes quit and free of all services.

(6) Rack-rent, a rent of the full value of the tenement, or near it.

(7) Fore-hand-rent, otherwise called a foregift or income, but more commonly a fine; it is a premium given by the lessee at the time of taking his lease, and has been considered as an improved rent.

All kinds of rents are now recoverable by distress.—4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 5.

Rent is not due till midnight of the day upon which it is reserved, although sunset is the time appointed by law to make a proper demand of it, to take advantage of a condition of re-entry or to tender it, in order to save a forfeiture; but more properly speaking, the demand should be made before sunset, so as to allow sufficient light to count the money; and the person making the demand or tender must remain on the land till the sun has set. Where rent is reserved generally, and no mention is made, as is usual, of half-yearly or quarterly payments, nothing is due until the end of the year.

Rent is considered as of a higher nature than even a debt due on an instrument under seal, as between the parties themselves; but in the case of the death of the tenant, rent in arrear, whether it be by deed or parol, is held to be of equal degree with specialty debts; and therefore in the distribution of the deceased's estate, it is to be paid with debts of that degree. As to the political theory of rent, see 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. b. 2, c. xvi.

Rentage, rent.

Rental, or Rent-roll, schedule or account of rent.

Rental-rights, a species of lease usually granted at a low rent and for life. Tenants under such leases were called rentalers or kindly tenants.

Rental'd teind bolls, when the tithes (tiends) have been liquidated and settled for so many bolls of corn yearly, by rental, or an old use of payment.—Scotch phrase.

Rente [Fr.], an annuity.

Rente viagère [Fr.], a life annuity.

Renunciation, the act of giving up a right.

Reparatione faciendâ, an ancient writ, which lay in many cases to compel repairs.—F. N. B. 127.

Repeal, a revocation or abrogation.

Repellitur à sacramento infamis.—Co. Litt. 158.—(An infamous person is prevented from taking an oath.) The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, renders a person convicted of crime a competent witness.

Repertory, a classified inventory.

Repetition, a recovery of money paid under mistake.—Civ. Law.

Repetitum namium, a second or reciprocal distress, in lieu of the first, which was eloigned.

Repetundæ, or Pecuniæ repetundæ, the term used to designate such sums of money as the socii of the Roman state, or individuals, claimed to recover from Magistratus, Judices or Publici Curatores, which they had improperly taken or received in the provinciæ, or in the Urbs Roma, either in the discharge of their jurisdictio, or in their capacity of Judices, or in respect of any other public function. Sometimes the word repetundæ was used to express the illegal act for which compensation was sought, as in the phrase, 'Repetundarum insimulari, damnari;' and pecuniæ meant, not only money, but anything that had value. Original inquiry was made into this offence, extra ordinem ex senatus consulto, as appears from the case of P. Furius Philus and M. Matienus, who were accused of it by the Hispani.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Repleader, to plead again.

The motion for a repleader is made, when, after issue joined and verdict thereon, the pleading is found (on examination) to have miscarried, and failed to effect its proper object, of raising an apt and material question between the parties. A repleader may become necessary where the issue has been defectively joined.

Where a repleader is applied for, on the ground of the immateriality of the issue, the cases establish the following distinction. If the immateriality is occasioned by a traverse of a pleading insufficient in point of law, and which it was therefore futile to bring into question in point of fact, and the case be such that the pleading so traversed might be made good by a different manner of pleading, the court will award a repleader, or, in some instances, allow the party by whom it was pleaded to amend. But if the pleading traversed discloses facts which show that the case of the party is incurably bad, and could not be set right by any manner of allegation, the court will not allow a repleader, but if the party is plaintiff will arrest the judgment; or if defendant, will award judgment non obstante veredicto. It is a clear rule, that the court will never grant a repleader, except where complete justice cannot otherwise be obtained; and it is never granted in favor of the person who made the first fault in the pleading. The judgment is general, quod partes replacitent, and they begin again at the first fault which occasioned the immaterial issue.

On a judgment of repleader, neither party is entitled to costs.—Step. Plead. 108; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1540.

Replegiare, to redeem a thing detained or taken by another by giving sureties.

It is applied in the Scotch law to the power of reclaiming a criminal, and trying him under a different jurisdiction from that of the court before which he is accused.

Replegiare de averiis, a writ brought by one whose cattle were distrained or put in pound, on any cause, by any person, on surety given to the sheriff to prosecute or answer an action.—F. N. B. 68.

Replegiari facias, the original writ out of Chancery commencing an action of replevin. It was superseded by the Statute of Marlbridge.—52 Hen. III. c. 21.

Repletion, where the revenue of a benefice is sufficient to fill or occupy the whole right or title of the graduate who holds it.—Canon Law.

Repleviable or Replevisable, that which may be taken back or replevied.

Replevin, a personal action ex delicto brought to recover possession of goods unlawfully taken, the validity of which taking it is the regular mode of contesting. The word means a re-delivery to the owner of the pledge or thing taken in distress. It is re-delivered to him by the registrar of the county court of the district within which it was taken, upon his giving security to try the validity of the distress or taking, in an action of replevin to be forthwith commenced by him against the distrainer and prosecuted with effect and without delay either in the county court or in a superior court, and to restore it if the right be adjudged against him; after which the distrainer may keep it till tender made of sufficient amends, but must then re-deliver it to the owner (See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 63, 64). Statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 22, enacts that the provisions of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, which relate to replevin, shall be taken to apply to all cases of replevin in like manner as to the cases of replevin of goods distrained for rent or damage feasant. Although this action is usually confined to goods, &c., taken in distress, it may be brought for all goods and chattels unlawfully taken. It is the proper form of action to recover a specific chattel; for in trover damages only are recovered. When an Act of Parliament orders a distress and sale of goods, it is in the nature of an execution, and this action does not lie, and a replevin of goods seized in order to condemnation would be a contempt of the Court of Exchequer, for which an attachment would be instantly granted.

This action is of two sorts: (1) In the detinet. (2) In the detinuit. Where the party has had his goods re-delivered to him, the action is in the detinuit; 'wherefore he detained the goods,' &c.; but where replevin has not been made, but the distrainer still keeps possession, the action is in the detinet, 'wherefore he detains the goods,' &c. The action in the detinet has long fallen into disuse, and is never brought unless the distrainer has eloigned the goods, so that they cannot be got at to make replevin.

It is a general rule, that whoever brings replevin ought to have the property of the goods either general or special in him at the time of the taking, and it lies against him who takes the goods and also against him who commands the taking, or against both. Whatever may be distrained may be replevied.

In cases of distress for rent, the replevy should be made before the expiration of five days after the distress made; which days are reckoned exclusively both of the day of distress and the day of sale, otherwise the distrainer may sell the goods; though, indeed, they may be replevied at any time before they have been actually sold. In all other cases of distress at common law, no time is limited for replevying, because the distrainer cannot sell the subject of distress.

An action of replevin may be commenced in any superior court in the form applicable to personal actions therein, and such court shall have power to hear and determine the same; and if the replevisor shall wish to commence proceedings in any superior court, he shall, at the time of the replevying, give security, to be approved of by the registrar, for such an amount as such registrar shall deem sufficient to cover the alleged rent or damage, in respect of which the distress shall have been made, and the probable costs of the cause in a superior court, conditioned to commence an action of replevin against the distrainer in such superior court as shall be named in the security, within one week from the date thereof, and to prosecute such action with effect and without delay, and unless judgment thereon be obtained by default, to prove before such superior court that he had good ground for believing, either that the title to some corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, or to some toll, market, fair, or franchise, was in question, or that such rent or damage exceeded 20*l.*, and to make return of the goods, if a return thereof shall be adjudged.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 65.

If the replevisor shall wish to commence proceedings in a county court, he shall at the time of replevying give security, to be approved of by the registrar, for such an amount as such registrar shall deem sufficient to cover the alleged rent or damage, in respect of which the distress shall have been made, and the probable costs of the cause in the county court, conditioned to commence an action of replevin against the distrainer in the county court for the district in which the distress shall have been taken, within one month from the date of the security, and to prosecute such action with effect and without delay, and to make return of the goods, if a return thereof shall be adjudged (s. 66).

Any action of replevin brought in a county court shall be removed into any superior court by writ of certiorari, if the defendant shall apply to such superior court or to a judge there for such writ, and shall give security to be approved of by the master of such superior court, for such amount, not exceeding 150*l.*, as such master shall think fit, conditioned to defend such action with effect, and unless the replevisor shall discontinue, or shall not prosecute such action, or become non-suit therein, to prove before such superior court that the defendant had good ground for believing, either that the title to some corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, or to some toll, market, fair, or franchise, was in question, or that the rent or damage in respect of which the distress shall have been taken exceeded 20*l.*, and every such superior court shall have power to determine the same action (s. 67).

There is an appeal from the county court, where the amount of the rent or damage exceeds 20*l.* A deposit of money may be made in lieu of security, ss. 68, 71.

The defendant enters his appearance with one of the masters. If he do not appear, the plaintiff, according to the old practice, served him with a four-day rule to appear, and upon his non-appearance thereto, sued out a pone per vadios; if no appearance entered on or before the appearance day of the return, the sheriff returned nihil on the pone, and a distringas was sued out, under which the sheriff levied 40*s.* After this, if no appearance were entered, an alias and then a pluries distringas issued; or if the sheriff returned nulla bona, a testatum distringas might be sued out into a different county. The issues were increased by motion to the court, both upon the alias and pluries distringas, upon the last of which they were increased to the amount of the debt and costs. If the defendant had not then appeared, a motion was made for a rule to show cause 'why the issues returned upon the several writs of distringas should not be sold, and the monies arising from the sale thereof should not be forthwith brought into court; and why it should not be referred to one of the masters to tax the plaintiff his costs occasioned by his issuing out the said several writs; and why such costs, when taxed, should not be paid out of the monies so brought into court; and why the surplus of the said monies after payment of the said costs should not be retained in court until the purpose of the said writs be answered.' If the rule were made absolute, the sheriff was served with a copy of it, and if he did not obey it, he was attached. This process was continued by distringas ad infinitum, applying from time to time to sell the issues for payment of the costs, until the defendant appeared; but if nulla bona were returned to the distringas, a capias to outlawry might have been had. If the plaint, however, have been removed by the defendant, or by accedas ad curiam, the pone per vadios was omitted. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1077.

After appearance, the plaintiff delivers his declaration, as in ordinary cases. The venue in this action is local and particular. The defendant may take a judgment of non pros. as in ordinary actions; but the plaintiff is not thereby prevented from proceeding, for he may sue out a writ of second deliverance. The defendant may, after judgment of non pros., proceed by writ of inquiry, in pursuance of 17 Car. II. c. 7, s. 2, which renders a writ of second deliverance void, because the goods still remain with the plaintiff; or he may take an assignment of the replevin bond, and proceed against the plaintiff and his sureties.

The pleas in replevin have been divided into four sorts:—(1) Pleas in abatement. (2) The plea of non cepit. (3) Pleas in justification. (4) Avowries or cognizances.

As replevin by writ is obsolete, pleas in abatement do not occur in practice.

The plea of non cepit used to be termed the general issue in replevin; but although it was so called, it put in issue only the taking and detention, and not the property.

There are two kinds of pleas in justification—those which disaffirm property in the plaintiff, and those which affirm property in the plaintiff—which might occur in the case of a distress being made for personal services, on the tenant dying, the replevin being sued out by the executors.

As to avowries and cognizances for rent. In them is set forth, as in a declaration, the nature and merits of the defendant's case, to show that the distress taken by him was lawful, and to entitle him to a judgment de retorno habendo. The technical difference between an avowry and cognizance is this: where the action is against the principal or landlord, he makes avowry, that is, he avows, taking the distress in his own right; where, on the other hand, it is against the bailiff or servant, he makes cognizance, that is, he acknowledges the taking in right of the principal or landlord; and where it is against both, the one avows and the other makes cognizance. Parceners must join in an avowry or cognizance for rent; for they make but one heir, and the rent is an entire inheritance. Joint-tenants should likewise join. The defendant in replevin need not set forth his title—11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 22; but this statute does not extend to an avowry for a rent-charge. The fact of being bailiff should be correctly stated, as it is traversable.

But avowries and cognizances damage feasant are not within the 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 22, and, therefore, the title of the avowant must be traced down directly; and the defendant must show that the place where, &c., is his freehold or the freehold of the person under whom he makes cognizance; and he must set forth the precise nature of the estate.

The plaintiff may plead in bar to an avowry or cognizance for rent, non demisit, non tenuit, nothing in arrear as to part of the rent and tender of the residue. That the avowant afterwards used or sold the cattle or goods distrained, may also be pleaded. Also, to an avowry for rent, a plea that before the defendant had any interest in the premises they were mortgaged in fee; that the mortgagor remained in possession, and demised to the defendant; that the defendant demised to the plaintiff; that afterwards the mortgage money being still due, and the rent avowed for in arrear, the mortgagee gave notice to the plaintiff to pay the rent to him, and threatened, in case of non-payment, to put the law in force, wherefore the plaintiff necessarily paid the rent to the mortgagee, is good, being a plea of payment. The statutes of set-off do not extend to replevin, therefore a set-off cannot be pleaded to an avowry for rent, neither can a mutual demand be given in evidence, where a defendant justifies under a distress; but the Statute of Limitations may be pleaded to some sorts of rents, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 2. The plaintiff may plead in bar 'tender of amends' to an avowry or cognizance damage feasant.

The pleadings in replevin subsequent to the plea in bar, vary with the particular circumstances of each individual case. They are, however, generally similar to those in other actions, except that they bear a name applicable to those of one stage later in the course of proceeding.

Demurrers to the declaration are not usual in practice, except where the place is omitted.

If the plaintiff plead to the avowry or cognizance, the issue may be made up in the ordinary way by either party; and after giving notice of trial, the plaintiff, or if he neglect to do so, the defendant, may make up the nisi prius record, enter the cause for trial, and proceed as in ordinary cases. If either plaintiff or defendant give notice of trial, and afterwards do not proceed to try the cause, or countermand his notice in time, the opposite party will be entitled to the costs of the day, as in ordinary cases.

The defendant cannot have a rule to discontinue; for though he be an actor in the action, yet still it is the plaintiff's action.

The landlord's title, under which the tenant has gained possession of the premises, cannot be disputed, although the tenant is prepared with evidence to show that the premises have been fraudulently conveyed to the landlord, and that the actual title is vested in another person.

If a verdict be found for the plaintiff, the jury assesses the damages, as in a verdict for a plaintiff in trespass. If there be judgment for the plaintiff upon a relictâ verificatione, cognovit actionem, nil dicit, &c., or for want of a replication to his plea in bar to the avowry, or upon a demurrer, a writ of inquiry of damages shall be awarded, or, at the request of the plaintiff, by the defendant's assent, the court may assess the damages without such writ; but if there be judgment for the plaintiff, by default, after appearance, there shall be a special writ of inquiry for the value of the goods or cattle, and damages.

If the verdict be for the defendant, the jury find the issues specially for the defendant, and the judgment is, that he have a return of the goods irreplevisable. The defendant may obtain his judgment for a return of the goods by suing out a writ de retorno habendo. If to this the sheriff return that the goods were eloigned, upon the writ and return being filed a capias in withernam is issued; and if the plaintiff have no goods or cattle, the sheriff returns nihil, and the defendant may thereupon sue out a scire facias against the pledges, or bring an action against the registrar, either if the pledges be insufficient, or if no pledges were taken. The plaintiff may have the usual writs of execution for his damages and costs.

The court will very seldom grant a new trial where the verdict is for the plaintiff; but proceedings in error will lie. See County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, ss. 119–121; Gilbert on Replevin; 2 Roscoe on Actions, 621; Woodf. Land. and Ten. 758–819; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1071–1094; 2 Selw. N. P. 1099–1225; and 3 Step. Com. 536 & 706.

Replevy, or Replevish, to let one to mainprise on surety; also to re-deliver goods which have been distrained to their owner, upon his giving pledges in an action of replevin.

Repliant, a litigant who replies, or files, or delivers a replication.

Replication, a plaintiff's answer to a defendant's plea, except in replevin, when it is pleaded by the defendant, who is a quasi plaintiff, in opposition to the plaintiff's plea in bar. As to a replication on equitable grounds, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 85, 86. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 299.

In equity, the plaintiff's reply to an answer or plea, which puts the suit at issue, for the purpose of taking evidence.

Reply, the response of the opening counsel on a trial, which is only allowed when evidence has been given in answer to the case first stated, except in the case of the Crown, which is always entitled to reply. See C. L. P. Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 185, s. 18), and 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 398.

Report, a public relation or bringing again to memory of cases judicially adjudged in courts of justice, with the reasons as delivered by the judges.—Co. Litt. 293.

Also, the certificate from the masters of the courts, when the courts make a reference to them concerning accounts, &c.; or from committees of either House of Parliament.

Reporter, a person who reports the decisions upon questions of law in the cases adjudged in the several Courts of Law and Equity.

Report-office, a department of the Court of Chancery. The suitors' account there is discontinued by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 36. See Smi. Ch. Pr. 25.

Reports, a vast number of law-books, which contain the statements of adjudged cases. Their accumulation is a grievance which demands a reform.

Reports, the, Lord Coke's reports, from 14 Eliz. to 13 Jac. I., which are quoted as 1 or 2 Rep. They are in 6 volumes.

Reposition of the forest, a reputting to; a re-afforesting, Manw. p. 1; also retrocession, or the returning back of a right assigned from the assignee to the person granting the right.—Scotch phrase.

Repositorium, a storehouse or place wherein things are kept; a warehouse.—Cro. Car. 555.

Repository, Public, mischief at, punishable by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 39.

Representation, standing in the place of another for certain purposes, as heirs, executors, administrators; also, a collateral statement, in insurance, either by parol or in writing, of such facts or circumstances relating to the proposed adventure, and not inserted in the policy, as are necessary for the information of the insurer to enable him to form a just estimate of the risk. Such representations are often the principal inducement to the contract, and afford the best ground upon which the premium can be calculated.—Encyc. Lond.

The written pleading presented to a lord ordinary of the Court of Session in Scotland when his judgment is brought under review.

Representative, bearing the character or power of another. An heir-at-law or devisee is a real representative; an executor or administrator is a personal representative.

Reprieve [fr. reprendre, Fr., to take back], the withdrawal of a criminal's sentence for an interval of time.

It may take place (1) ex mandato reginæ, at the mere pleasure of the Crown.

Or (2) ex arbitrio judicis, either before or after judgment; as, where the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, or the indictment is insufficient, or any favorable circumstances appear in the criminal's character, in order to give time to apply to the Crown for either an absolute or conditional pardon.

Or, (3) ex necessitate legis; as, where a woman is capitally convicted, and pleads her pregnancy. See JURY WOMEN.

Or, (4) if the criminal become non compos.—4 Step. Com. 552.

Reprimand, a censure by a public functionary.

Reprisal, the taking one thing in satisfaction for another. Reprisals are used between nation and nation, in order to do themselves justice, when they cannot otherwise obtain it. If a nation has taken possession of what belongs to another—if she refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it—the latter may seize something belonging to the former, and apply it to her own advantage, unless she obtains payment of what is due to her, together with interest and damages or may keep it as a pledge until she has received ample satisfaction. For the latter it is rather a stoppage or a seizure than reprisals, but they are frequently confounded in common language. Valet, by Chit. 283. Reprisals are either ordinary, as arresting and taking the goods of merchant-strangers within the realm, or extraordinary, as satisfaction out of the realm, and are under the Great Seal.—Lex. Mercat. 120. Also recaption, which see. See LETTERS OF MARQUE and CAPIAS IN WITHERNAM.

Reprises, deductions and payments out of a manor or lands, as rent-charges, annuities, &c.

Reprobata pecunia liberat solventem.—9 Co. 79.—(Money refused, frees the debtor.)

Reprobation, the propounding of exceptions either to facts, persons, or things.—Eccle. Law.

Reprobator, Action of, a proceeding intended to convict a witness of perjury in Scotland, to which action the witness must be made a party.

Rep-silver, money anciently paid by servile tenants to their lord, to be quit of the duty of reaping his corn.

Republic, the state independently of its form of government; a commonwealth; also a form of government in which power is derived from the people alone.

Republication of wills, a second publication, an avowed renewal.

No will or codicil, or any part thereof, which shall be in any manner revoked, shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner by the Wills Act required, and showing an intention to revive the same, and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked, and afterwards wholly revoked, shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary be shown.—7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 22.

Every will re-executed or republished or revived, by any codicil, shall for the purposes of the Wills Act be deemed to have been made at the time at which the same shall be so re-executed, republished, or revived (s. 34).

Repudiation, the putting-away of a wife or a woman betrothed; also the renunciation of a right, or the refusal to accept a benefice.

Repugnant, that which is contrary to what is stated before, or insensible. A repugnant condition is void.

Reputation, credit, honor, character, good name.

Injuries to one's reputation, which is a personal right, are defamatory and malicious words, libels, malicious indictments or prosecutions.

Reputatio est vulgaris opinio ubi non est veritas. Et vulgaris opinio est duplex, scil.—Opinio vulgaris orta inter graves et discretos homines, et quæ vultum veritatis habet; et opinio tantum orta inter leves et vulgares homines, absque specie veritatis.—4 Co. 107.—(Reputation is vulgar opinion where there is not truth. And common opinion is of two kinds: to wit, common reputation arising among grave and sensible men, and which has the appearance of truth; and mere opinion arising among foolish and ignorant men, without any appearance of truth.)

Reputed owner, one who has, to all appearances, the right and actual possession of property. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 125; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 72.

Request, a demand or requirement.

Request-notes, applications to obtain a permit for removing excisable articles.

Requests, Courts of, tribunals of a special jurisdiction for the recovery of small demands, which are abolished by the Small Debts' Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and Order in Council, 9th May, 1847, with a few exceptions. There was a court of requests, of the king in person, which was virtually abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 10.

Requisition, a notarial demand of a debt made by a creditor, in consequence of a clause in the securities for debt previous to the Reformation, when a personal obligation was deemed illegal.—Scotch term.

Requisitions of title, a series of inquiries and requests which arise upon a title on behalf of a proposed purchaser, and which the vendor is called upon to satisfy and comply with. They are frequently much curtailed by the conditions of sale.

Rere-fiefs, inferior feudatories in Scotland.

Rerum ordo confunditur, si unicuique jurisdictio non servetur.—4 Inst. Proœm.—(The order of things is confounded if everyone preserve not his jurisdiction.)

Rerum progressus ostendunt multa, quæ in initio præcaveri seu prævideri non possunt.—6 Co. 40.—(The progress of events shows many things which, at the beginning, could not be guarded against or foreseen).

Rerum suarum quilibet est moderator et arbiter.—Co. Litt. 223.—(Everyone is the moderator and arbiter of his own affairs.)

Re-sale, a second sale.

Res, all physical and metaphysical existences in which persons may claim a right. See Sand. Just. 176, and Cum. C. L. 59.

Res gestæ, all the surrounding facts of a transaction.

Res integra, an entire thing or agreement.

Resceit, or Receit [fr. receptio, Lat.], an admission or receiving of a third person to plead his right in a cause already commenced between two other persons.

Resceit of homage, the lord's receiving homage of his tenant at his admission to the land.—Kitch. 148.

Rescission, annulment or destruction.

Rescissory Action, one to rescind a contract. Scotch Law.

Rescous, the setting at liberty, against law, a person arrested by process or course of law. To recover a compensation for this injury, the plaintiff may bring an action of rescous, or an action on the case, against the party guilty of the rescous. The actions of rescous having fallen into disuse, the usual mode of proceeding is by an action on the case; to support which it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove, if put in issue by the pleadings:—

(1) The original cause of action.

(2) The writ and warrant, by the production of copies of them, sworn to be true copies by a witness who has compared and examined them with the originals.

(3) The manner of arrest, in order that it may appear to the court whether the arrest was legal or not; for without a legal arrest there cannot be a rescue.—2 Selw. N. P. 1226.

Rescript, the answer of the Roman emperor when consulted by particular persons on some difficult question; it is equivalent to an edict or decree; a counterpart.

Rescriptum principis contra jus non valet.—Reg. Civ. Jur.—(The prince's rescript avails not against law.)

Rescue of distress, the taking away and setting at liberty, against law, a distress effected. Rescue lies where a person distrains for rent or services, or for damage feasant, and is desirous of impounding the distress, and another person rescues the distress from him. The party distraining must be in possession of the distress, otherwise there cannot be a rescue.

The action of rescue has fallen into disuse; the usual remedy is by an action on the case, under 2 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 5, s. 4.—1 Selw. N. P. 686. When a distress is taken without cause, or contrary to law, the tenant may lawfully make rescue before it is impounded, for then it is deemed to be in the custody of the law. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 30 gives a summary remedy for pound breach, and rescue in certain cases after a distress for damage feasant.—Wood. L. and T. 319, 420, and 739; 3 Step. Com. 364.

Rescue of a prisoner. If the defendant after he is arrested on mesne process, and before he is carried to prison, be rescued from the sheriff or his officer, the sheriff will be excused from having his body in court at the return of the writ, and may make his return to the writ accordingly. But a rescue after the defendant has been carried to prison, even where the sheriff is bringing him from the prison to the court by habeas corpus, will not excuse the sheriff, and he is answerable for it as escape. And an escape owing to the negligence of the officer, will not justify the return of a rescue.

If the sheriff return the rescue, the offenders may be punished by attachment, or by indictment, and a special action on the case lies against them by the plaintiff for damages, whether the rescue be returned or not. The court has permitted a defendant to show by affidavit, in mitigation of punishment, that in fact there had been no legal arrest.

The sheriff cannot excuse himself by returning a rescue on final process, as he may in the case of mense process, unless the rescue was by the Queen's enemies. If the defendant be rescued, therefore, the plaintiff may either have an action against the sheriff or gaoler in whose custody he was, or he may sue out a fresh ca. sa., or an execution against the defendant's goods, &c. at his option.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 693.

A rescue of one apprehended for felony is felony; for treason, treason; and for a misdemeanor, a misdemeanor; it is punishable by fine or imprisonment.—4 Step. Com. 305 n., 309.

Rescussor, the party making a rescue.

Res denominatur à principali parte.—9 Co. 47.—(The thing is named from its principal part.)

Resealing writ, the second sealing of a writ by the master so as to continue it, or to cure it of an irregularity.

Res est misera ubi jus est vagum et incertum. 2 Salk. 512.—(It is a miserable thing where law is vague and uncertain.)

Reservatio non debet esse de proficuis ipsis, quia ea cŏnceduntur, sed de reditu novo extra proficua.—Co. Litt. 142.—(A reservation ought not to be of the profits themselves, because they are granted, but from the new rent apart from the profits.)

Reservation, a keeping aside or providing.

Reserve Force. The 22 & 23 Vict. c. 40, establishes a reserve volunteer force of seamen, and c. 42 establishes a reserve force of men who have been in Her Majesty's service. See NAVAL COAST VOLUNTEERS.

Reserving, a question of law at sessions or assizes. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78.

Reset, the receiving or harbouring an outlawed person.

Reset of theft, the feloniously receiving and keeping of stolen property, with knowledge of the theft.—Scotch phrase.

Resetter, a knowing receiver of stolen property.

Res generalem habet significationem, quia, tam corporea quam incorporea, cujuscunque sunt generis, naturæ, sivè speciei, comprehendit.—3 Inst. 182.—(The word 'thing' has a general signification, because it comprehends corporeal and incorporeal objects, of whatever nature, sort, or species.)

Resiance, residence, abode, or continuance.

Resiant Rolls, those containing the resiants in a tithing, &c. which are to be called over by the steward on holding courts leet.

Residence, abode; also the continuance of a parson or vicar on his benefice. It is upon the supposition of residence that the law styles every parochial minister an incumbent.

By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, repealing the former Acts on the subject, every spiritual person holding a benefice (a term, which as used in this Act, comprises all parochial churches, perpetual curacies, chapels, and church or chapel districts whatever, if with cure of souls) shall keep residence on his benefice, and in the house of residence belonging thereto; and if he absent himself therefrom for a period exceeding three months, either accounted together or several times, in any one year, he shall forfeit, unless resident at some other of his benefices, a certain portion (increasing with the length of absence) of the annual value of his benefice. The exceptions and modifications to which are:—

1stly. No heads of houses in the University of Cambridge or Oxford, or warden of the University of Durham, or head master of Eton, Winchester or Westminster School, who shall have respectively not more than one benefice, shall be liable to the penalties of non-residence.

2ndly. Deans and archdeacons, and various public professors, readers, preachers, and chaplains, the provost of Eton, the warden of Winchester, the master of the Charterhouse, the principal of St. David's and of King's College, London; and also (provided they are not absent from their benefices more than five months in the year) the fellows of Eton and Winchester and all canons, minor canons, priests, vicars, and vicars choral, are entitled to count the time of their official residences or duties as if it had been passed upon their benefices.

4thly. If there be no house, or no fit house of residence, and such certificate be also produced as by the Act provided, that no house convenient for the residence of the holder of the benefice can be obtained within the parish, or within the specified distance from the church or chapel, or if the residence of the holder of any benefice within those limits is prevented by any incapacity of mind or body, or by the dangerous illness of his wife or child (but subject in the latter case to certain restrictions as to time and otherwise), the bishop may grant a license of non-residence, or, in case of his refusal, there may be an appeal to the archbishop of the province.

5thly. If the holder of any benefice happen to occupy in the same parish any mansion or messuage whereof he is the owner, the bishop may grant him a license to reside therein, and if he refuse, remedy may be had by the same course of appeal.

It is further provided by this Act, that annual returns of residents and non-residents shall be made to her Majesty in council; and that in case of non-residence, the bishop, instead of proceeding to enforce the penalties, may issue a monition against the offender, to be followed up, where requisite, by an order to reside; and in case of non-compliance with such order, may sequester the profits of the benefice, and apply them to the purposes in the Act specified. In case also of long-continued or repeated sequestration, the benefice is to become void, and a new presentation may be made, as if the former holder were dead.

For the more effectual promotion of this important duty of residence among the parochial clergy, there is also contained in this Act (as in several others) a variety of provisions for repairing the houses in which they are to reside, and for building and purchasing new ones, and for raising money for these purposes by mortgage of the benefices.—3 Step. Com. 33.

Resident, an agent, minister, or officer residing in any distant place with the dignity of an ambassador. Residents are a class of public ministers inferior to ambassadors and envoys; but, like them, they are under the protection of the law of nations.—Encyc. Lond.

Also, a tenant who was obliged to reside on his lord's land, and not to depart from the same; called also, homme levant et couchant, and in Normandy, resseant du fief.—Leg. H. I.

Residual, or Residuary, relating to the residue; relating to the part remaining.

Residuary devisee, the person named in a will who is to take all the real property remaining over and above the other devises.

It is provided by 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 25, 'that unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, such real estate or interest therein as shall be comprised or intended to be comprised in any devise in such will contained, which shall fail or be void by reason of the death of the devisee in the lifetime of the testator, or by reason of such devise being contrary to law or otherwise incapable of taking effect, shall be included in the residuary devise (if any) contained in such will.'

Residuary legatee, the person to whom the surplus of the personal estate, after the discharge of all debts and particular legacies, is left by the testator's will.—2 Wms. Exs. 1310.

Residuum, the surplus of a testator's or intestate's estate after discharging all his liabilities. Unless it appear in the will that the executor was intended to have the residue, he will be deemed by a court of equity as trustee for the next of kin (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 40). The distribution of the surplusage of intestate's estate is provided for by 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10, explained by 29 Car. II. c. 3; and 1 Jac. II. c. 17.

Resignatio est juris proprii spontanea refutatio.—Godb. 284.—(Resignation is a spontaneous relinquishment of one's own right.)

Resignation, the giving up a claim, office, or possession; also, the yielding up a benefice into the hands of the ordinary, called by the canonists, renunciation; and though it is synonymous with surrender, yet it is by use restrained to yielding up a spiritual living to the bishop, as surrender is the giving up of temporal land into the hands of the lord.

A bond may be taken to secure the resignation of a living, in favor of any one person whomsoever, and in favor of one of two persons, if they are the uncle, son, grandson, brother, nephew, or grandnephew of the patron. 9 Geo. IV. c. 94. See Bond.

The retirement of the late Bishops of London and Durham was provided for by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 115.

Resignee, one in favor of whom a resignation is made.

Res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet. Co. Litt. 132.—(Things done between strangers ought not to injure one not a party.)

Res judicata pro veritate accipitur.—Co. Litt. 103.—(A thing adjudicated is received as true.)

Res mancipi, things which might be sold and alienated.—Civ. Law.

Res nova (something new).

Res nullius (a thing which has not an owner).

Resolution, a solemn judgment or decision; a revocation of a contract; an act or agreement adopted by an assembly.

Resolutory condition, one the accomplishment of which revokes a prior obligation.

Resort, the authority or jurisdiction of a court. The House of Lords is the dernier ressort in cases of appeal.

Respectively, particularly; as each belongs to each.

Respectu computi vicecomitis habendo, a writ for respiting a sheriff's account, addressed to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer.—Reg. Orig. 139.

Respectum challenge propter. See Jury.

Res perit domino (a thing lost to its owner). Res per pecuniam æstimatur, et non pecunia per rem.—9 Co. 76.—(The value of a thing is estimated according to its worth in money; but the value of money is not estimated by reference to the thing.)

Respite, pause, reprieve; suspension of a capital sentence; a delay, forbearance, or continuation of time.

There are respites of execution, of debt, of homage, and of a jury.

Respiciendum est judicanti, ne quid aut durius aut remissius constituatur quam causa deposcit; nec enim aut severitatis aut clementiæ gloria affectanda est.—3 Inst. 220.—(It is a matter of import to one adjudicating that nothing either more severe or more lenient should be done than the cause itself demands, and that the glory neither of severity nor clemency should be affected.)

Respondeat ouster (let him answer over). If a demurrer is joined in a plea to the jurisdiction, person, or writ, &c. and it be judged that the defendant put in a more substantial plea, interlocutory judgment is given that he shall answer.

Also, if a prisoner fail upon a plea in bar, he has judgment of respondeat ouster, and may plead over to the offence the general issue, not guilty.

Respondeat raptor qui ignorare non potuit quod pupillum alienum abduxit.—Hob. 99.—(Let the ravisher himself answer, for he cannot be ignorant that he has taken away another's ward.)

Respondeat superior (let the principal answer). If a coroner of a county is insufficient, the county, as his superior, shall answer for him.—Wood's Inst. 83.

Responde-book (in Exchequer). A book kept by the directors of Chancery, in Scotland, in which are entered the accounts of all non-entry and relief duties, payable by heirs, who take precepts from Chancery.

Respondent, an answerer in a suit, whether for himself or another; the defendant in an appeal.

Respondentia, money which is borrowed not upon the vessel, as in bottomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage; in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract.—7 Geo. I. c. 21, s. 2; 19 Geo. II. c. 37, s. 5; 2 Selw. N. P. 1038.

Respondere non debet [Lat.] (he ought not to answer).

Responsa prudentum, the opinions and decisions of learned lawyers, forming part of the Roman laws.—Cum. C. L. 6.

Responsalis ad lucrandum vel petendum, he who appears and answers for another in court at a day assigned; a proctor, attorney, or deputy.—1 Reeves, 169.

Res profectò stulta est nequitiæ modus.—11 Co. 8 b.—(The measure of wickedness is a thing truly foolish.)

Resseiser, the taking of lands into the hands of the Crown, where a general livery or ouster le main was formerly misused.—Staundf. Prærog.

Restamping writ, passing it a second time through the proper office, whereupon it receives a new stamp.

Restaur, or Restor, the remedy or recourse which assurers have against each other, according to the date of their assurances; or against the master, if the loss arise through his default, as through ill-loading, want of caulking, or want of having the vessel tight; also, the remedy or recourse a person has against his guarantee or other person, who is to indemnify him from any damage sustained.—Encyc. Lond.

Restitutio in integrum, the rescinding of a contract or transaction, so as to place the parties to it in the same position, with respect to one another, which they occupied before the contract was made, or the transaction took place. The restitutio here spoken of is founded on the edict. If the contract or transaction is such as not to be valid, according to the jus civile, this restitutio is not needed, and it only applies to cases of contracts and transactions, which are not in their nature or form invalid. In order to entitle a person to the restitutio, he must have sustained some injury capable of being estimated, in consequence of the contract or transaction, and not through any fault of his own, except in the case of one who is minor xxv. annorum, who was protected by the restitutio against the consequences of his own carelessness.

The following are the chief cases in which a restitutio might be decreed:—

The case of vis et metus. When a man had acted under the influence of force or reasonable fear, caused by the acts of the other party, he had an actio quod metus causa, for restitution, against the party who was the wrong doer; and also against an innocent person, who was in possession of that which had thus illegally been got from him; and also against the heredes of the wrong-doer, if they were enriched by being his heredes. If he were sued in respect of the transaction, he could defend himself by an exceptio quod metus causa. The actio quod metus was given by the prætor, L. Octavius, a contemporary of Cicero.

The case of dolus. When a man was fraudulently induced to become a party to a transaction, which was legal in all respects saving the fraud, he had his actio de dolo malo against the guilty person and his heredes, so far as they were made richer by the fraud, for the restoration of the thing of which he had been defrauded; and if that were not possible, for compensation. Against a third party, who was in bonâ fide possession of the thing, he had no action. If he were sued in respect of the transaction, he could defend himself by the exceptio doli mali.

The case of minores xxv. annorum. A minor could by himself do no legal act, for which the assent of a tutor or curator was required; and, therefore, if he did such act by himself, no restitutio was necessary. If the tutor had given his auctoritas, or the curator his assent, the transaction was legally binding; but yet the minor could claim restitutio if he had sustained injury by the transaction.

There were, however, cases in which minores could obtain no restitutio; for instance, when a minor with a fraudulent design gave himself out to be a major, when he confirmed the transaction after coming of age, and in other cases.

The case of absentia, which comprehends not merely absence in the ordinary sense of the word, but absence owing to madness or imprisonment, and the like causes.

The case of error. Mistake comprehends such error as cannot be imputed to blame; and in such case a man could always have restitutio when another was enriched by his loss.

The case of alienatio in fraudem creditorum facta (Dig. xlii. tit. 8). When a man was insolvent (non solvendo), and alienated his property for the purpose of injuring his creditors, the prætor's edict gave the creditors a remedy.

In the imperial times restitutio was also applied to the remission of a punishment (Tac. Ann. xiv. 12; Plin. Ep. x. 64, 55; Dig. xlviii. tit. 19, s. 27), which could only be done by the imperial grace.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.; Sand. Just. 130.

Restitution, the restoring anything unjustly taken from another; also, putting in possession of lands or tenements him who had been unlawfully disseised of them; a person being attainted of treason, &c. he or his heirs may be restored to his lands, &c. by royal charter of pardon.

Restitution of conjugal rights, a species of matrimonial cause, which is brought whenever the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason, in which case the Divorce and Matrimonial Court will compel them to come together again, if either party desire it.—2 Step. Com. 253. See MARRIAGE.

Restitution of minors, a restoring them to rights lost by deeds executed during their minority.

Restitution of stolen goods. By the common law there was no restitution of goods upon an indictment, because it is at the suit of the Crown only, therefore the party was enforced to bring an appeal of robbery in order to have his goods again; but latterly it has been the practice of the court, upon the conviction of a felon, to order immediate restitution of such goods as are brought into court to be made to the several prosecutors. A writ or order of restitution may be issued by virtue of the Larceny Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, which enacts, that if any person guilty of any felony or misdemeanor under that Act (with an exception as to convictions of trustees, bankers, and other agents for misdemeanors under the Act in respect of goods or documents of title entrusted to them), in stealing, taking, obtaining, extorting, embezzling, converting, or disposing of, or in knowingly receiving any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property, shall be indicted for the same, by or on behalf of the owner, his executor or administrator, and be convicted thereof, the property shall in such case be restored to the owner or his representative, and the court shall have power to award from time to time writs of restitution for such property, or to order the restitution thereof in a summary manner. This, however, is subject to a proviso as to valuable securities, that if before the award of restitution, it shall appear that they have been bonâ fide paid or discharged by some person liable to the payment thereof, or, being negotiable instruments, shall have been bonâ fide taken by transfer or delivery, by some person for a just and valuable consideration, without any notice or reasonable cause to suspect that they had been stolen, taken, obtained, extorted, embezzled, converted, or disposed of by means of any felony, or misdemeanor, in such case no restitution shall be awarded.—4 Step. Com. 521.

Restitution, Writ of. If the judgment below be reversed in a court of error, the plaintiff in error may have a writ of restitution in order that he may be restored to all he has lost by the judgment. If execution on the former judgment have been actually executed, and the money paid over, the writ of restitution may issue without any previous scire facias, but if the money have not been paid over, a scire facias quare restitutionem non, suggesting the matter of fact, viz., the sum levied, &c., must previously issue.

And, generally, if money, &c., be levied under a writ of execution, and the judgment be afterwards reversed or set aside, the party against whom the execution was sued out may have this writ of restitution; but where the judgment is set aside for irregularity, &c., restitution (when necessary) forms part of the rule; and if the goods or money be not restored, the court will grant an attachment.

A writ of restitution may also be awarded when a judgment in ejectment is upset.

Re-restitution takes place when there has been a writ of restitution before granted; and restitution is generally a matter of duty, but re-restitution is matter of grace.—Raym. 35.

Restitutione extracti ab ecclesia, a writ to restore a man to the church, which he had recovered for his sanctuary, being suspected of felony.—Reg. Orig. 69.

Restitutione temporalium, a writ addressed to the sheriff, to restore the temporalities of a bishopric to the bishop elected and confirmed.—F. N. B. 169.

Restraining Order. The 5th Vict. c. 5, s. 4, extends the preventive powers of Chancery by giving its judges authority, upon the application of any party interested, by motion or petition, supported by an affidavit of the necessity for such an intervention, in a summary way, without bill filed, to restrain the governor and company of the Bank of England, or any other public company, whether incorporated or not, from permitting the transfer of any stock in the public funds, or any stock or shares in any public company, which may be standing in the name or names of any person or persons or body politic or corporate, in the books of the governor and company of the Bank of England, or in the books of any such public company, or from paying any dividend or dividends due or to become due thereon; and every such order is to specify the amount of the stock or the particular shares to be affected thereby, and the name or names of the person or persons, body politic or corporate, in which the same shall be standing. The court has full power, upon the application of any party interested, to discharge or vary such order, and to award costs.

The restraining order continues in force until discharged under the court's authority; but as this order is intended for interim purposes only, it will be discharged if a bill be not filed within such a period as the court may consider reasonable. Obedience to the order is enforced by the ordinary process of contempt.

Restraining powers, those which involve restrictions.

Restraining statutes, those which restrict previous rights and powers, as 1 Eliz. c. 19; 13 Eliz. cc. 10 & 20; 14 Eliz. c. 11; 18 Eliz. cc. 6 & 11; and 43 Eliz. c. 9. See 5 Reeves, c. xxiii., p. 26.

Restrictive endorsement, one limiting the payment of money to a named person only.

Resulting trust, one that arises from the operation or construction of equity, and in pursuance of the rule that trusts result to the person from whom the consideration moves, of which the following are instances:—

(1) Upon a contract to purchase a real-estate, a trust immediately results to the vendee, since equity looks upon things agreed to be done as actually performed.

(2) Where a purchase is made in the name of one, and the consideration is given, or paid by another, a trust results in favor of the latter, though there be no express declaration for the purpose; but not so, if the purchase-money were paid by several, for that would be to introduce all the mischiefs which the statute of frauds was intended to prevent. There must then be a written declaration of trust. To raise a trust of this kind, the fact of the ownership of the money should appear upon the face of the deed, either by a recital, or by expressions which amount to a necessary implication, or presumptive proof of it.

(3) A purchase by a trustee with the trust-money, will raise a resulting trust to the person entitled to such money.

(4) A conveyance to a man, without consideration, raises a resulting trust for the original owner.

(5) Where a trust is declared in part of an estate only, what remains undisposed of results to the grantor or his heir-at-law.

(6) When the trusts created cannot take effect, a trust will result to the original owner or his heir.

(7) Where a conveyance is made to trustees, upon such trusts, and for such intents and purposes as A. shall appoint, and A. never appoints, the trust results to him and his heirs.

(8) If a trustee renew a lease in his own name, such lease will be subject to the trust affecting the old lease.

(9) Where there is fraud in obtaining a conveyance, the grantee will be held, in equity, a trustee for the person defrauded.

(10) A wife cannot be a trustee for her husband; if then a husband purchase lands in his wife's name, it is presumed to be a provision for her.

(11) Where a son is married in the lifetime of his father, and by him fully advanced and emancipated, a purchase by the father, in the name of his son, may be a trust for the father, as much as if it had been in the name of a stranger; because, in that case, all presumptions and obligations of advancement cease. But, where the son is not advanced, or but advanced or emancipated in part, there is no room for any construction of a trust by implication; and without clear proof to the contrary, it ought to be taken as an advancement of the son, although the father take the possession, and receive the rents and profits. If a grandfather purchase lands in the name of his grandchild, the father being dead, it is an advancement, and not a trust; for the grandfather is in loco parentis. And it is the same, if a father purchase in the names of his son and a trustee, or in the names of himself and son; but, in this case, a moiety of the estate will be subject to the father's debts.

Resulting use, an implied use.

A resulting use arises where the legal seisin is transferred, and no use is expressly declared, nor any consideration nor evidence of intent to direct the use; the use then remains in the original grantor, for it cannot be supposed that the estate was intended to be given away, and the statute immediately transfers the legal estate to such resulting use.

If the intent of the parties that the use should not result be plainly manifested, it will remain in the persons to whom the legal estate is limited. Parol evidence is admissible to show this intent, for the statute of frauds requiring declaration of uses to be in writing and signed by the party, extends, in cases of conveyances to uses, to third persons only, and not to the persons conveying or those to whom lands are conveyed to uses.—29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 8; but see Lamplugh v. Lamplugh, 1 P. Wms. 112.

The doctrine of resulting uses extends only to those cases where an estate in fee-simple passes; it is not applicable where an estate-tail, an estate for life, or an estate for years is granted; for a consideration or declaration of the use prevents its resulting, and a tenure is a consideration, in consequence of the rent or service which it includes; a use, therefore, cannot result on the conveyance of a particular estate, i.e. an estate less than fee simple.

When any particular uses are declared, which do not exhaust the whole estate, so much of the use as the owner of the lands does not dispose of, remains in him. The operation of this rule takes place in transfers operating by non-transmutation of possession; that part of the use undisposed of by the bargainor or covenantor is retained by him as his old estate, and is denominated a use by implication; ex. gra. if D. covenant to stand seised to the use of his heirs male, begotten or to be begotten, D. takes an estate for life by implication, for it is impossible for him to have any such heirs during his life, consequently the use undisposed of during his life remains in D.—Pybus v. Mitford, 1 Vent. 327. Neither resulting uses nor uses by implication can ever arise to any person other than the original owner of the estate.

And where a use is expressly limited to the owner of the estate, he will not be allowed to take any resulting or implied use inconsistent with the use limited to him.

Re-summons, a second summons, calling upon a person to answer an action where the first summons is defeated.

Resumption, the taking again by the Crown of such lands or tenements, &c. as on false suggestion had been granted by letters-patent. Broke, 298.

Res Universitatis, property belonging to a city or municipal corporation.

Retail, to sell goods in small parcels and not in gross.

Retainer, a servant who does not continually dwell in his master's abode, but only wears his livery, and attends sometimes upon special occasions; also, a special authority given by a client to his attorney or solicitor to institute a suit or conduct a defence for him.

Retainer of debts. Among debtors of equal degree an executor or administrator is allowed to pay himself first, by retaining in his hands so much as his debt amounts to.—2 Wms. Exs. 936.

Retaining fee [fr. merces retinens, Lat.], a preliminary fee given to a counsel in order to ensure his advocacy.

Retaliation, the lex talionis, which see.

Retenementum, detaining, withholding, or keeping back.

Retention, the right of withholding a debt or retaining property until a debt due to the person claiming the right of retention shall be paid; a lien.

Retinentia, a retinue, or persons retained by a prince or nobleman.

Retiring a bill, taking up and paying a bill of exchange when due.

Retorna brevium, the return of writs.

Retorno habendo, when the defendant has judgment in replevin for the return of the goods, there issues in his favor a writ de retorno habendo, whereby the goods are returned again into his custody, to be sold or otherwise disposed of, as if no replevin had been made. See REPLEVIN.

Retorsion, retaliation.

Retour, an extract from the Chancery of the service of an heir to his ancestors.—Scotch term.

Retour sans protêt [Fr.] (return without protest), a request or direction by a drawer of a bill of exchange, that should the bill be dishonored by the drawee, it be returned without protest or without expense (sans frais).—Chit. on Bills.

Retoured duty, the valuation, both new and old, of lands expressed in the retour to the Chancery, when any is returned or served there.—Scotch phrase.

Retractus aquæ, the ebb or return of a tide.

Retractus feudalis, a power anciently claimed by the superior of an estate to pay off a debt adjudged, and to take a conveyance of the estate.—Scotch phrase.

Retraxit (he has withdrawn), a proceeding somewhat similar to a nolle prosequi, except that a retraxit is a bar to any future action for the same cause, whereas a nolle prosequi is not, unless made after judgment. The former is made in person, in open court, when the trial is called on; the latter is made by a mere entry on the roll out of court.

This proceeding is very unusual in practice. 2 Chit. Arch. Prac: by Pren. 1502.

Retrocession, a reassignment of inheritable rights to the cedent or original assignor.—Civ. Law.

Rette, a charge or accusation.

Return-days, certain days in term for the return of writs.

Returning officer, the official who conducts a parliamentary election. He is the sheriff in counties, and the mayor in boroughs.—2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 11; and 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 57. As to an action against him, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. s. 103.

Returning from transportation, coming back to this country before the term of punishment is determined. It is an offence against public justice.—4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 67. The punishment of transportation is abolished. See PENAL SERVITUDE.

Returno habendo. See RETORNO HABENDO.

Returnum averiorum, a judicial writ, similar to the retorno habendo.

Returnum irreplegiabile, a judicial writ addressed to the sheriff for the final restitution or return of cattle to the owner when unjustly taken or distrained, and so found by verdict; it is granted after a nonsuit in a second deliverance.—Reg. Judic. 27.

Reus, a defendant, properly the debtor to whom the question was put. Rei, the parties or litigants.—Cum. C. L. 251.

Reus læsæ majestatis punitur, ut pereat unus ne pereant omnes.—4 Co. 124.—(A traitor is punished that one may perish, and not all perish.)

Reve, or Greeve, the bailiff of a franchise or manor, an officer in parishes within forests, who marks the commonable cattle.

Revelach, rebellion.

Reveland, the land which in Domesday is said to have been thane-land, and afterwards converted into reveland. It seems to have been land which having reverted to the king after the death of the thane, who had it for life, was not granted out to any by the king, but rested in charge upon the account of the reve or bailiff of the manor.—Spelm. Feuds, c. xxiv.

Revels, sports of dancing, masking, &c. formerly used in princes' courts, the inns of court, and noblemen's houses, commonly performed by night; there was an officer to order and supervise them, who was entitled the Master of the Revels.—Cowel.

Revendication. Upon the sale of goods on credit, by the law of some commercial countries, a right is reserved to the vendor to retake them, or he has a lien upon them for the price, if unpaid; and in other countries he possesses a right of stoppage in transitu, only in cases of insolvency of the vendee. The Roman law did not generally consider the transfer of property to be complete by sale and delivery alone without payment or security given for the price, unless the vendor agreed to give a general credit to the purchaser; but it allowed the vendor to reclaim the goods out of the possession of the purchaser; as being still his own property. Quod vendidi (say the Pandects), non aliter fit accipientis, quam si aut pretium nobis solutum sit, aut satis eo nomine datum, vel etiam fidem habuerimus emptori sine ullâ satisfactione. The present code of France gives a privilege or right of revendication against the purchaser for the price of goods sold, so long as they remain in the possession of the debtor. In respect to ships, a privilege is given by the same code to certain classes of creditors, such as vendors, builders, repairers, mariners, &c. upon the ship, which takes effect even against subsequent purchasers, until the ship has made a voyage after the purchase; and, by the general maritime law, acknowledged in most, if not in all, commercial countries, hypothecations and liens are recognised to exist for seamen's wages and for repairs of foreign ships, and for salvage. Story's Confl. Laws, sect. 401.

Revenue, income, annual profit received from land or other funds; also, the profits or fiscal prerogatives of the Crown.

Revenue-causes are peculiarly within the province of the Court of Exchequer.

Reversal of judgment, a judgment may be reversed without a writ of error, for matters foreign to or dehors the record, that is not apparent upon the face of it, so that they cannot be assigned for error in the superior court, which can only judge from what appears in the record itself; or by writ of error, which lies from all inferior jurisdictions to the Queen's Bench and thence to the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords. It is brought for mistakes as to matters of substance, appearing in the judgment or other parts of the record. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68, amended by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 32; and 4 Step. Com. 547. As to reversal of outlawry, see OUTLAWRY.

Reverse, to undo, repeal, or make void.

Reverser, a reversioner.

Reversion [fr. revertor, Lat.], that portion left of an estate after a grant of a particular portion of it, short of the whole estate, has been made by the owner to another person. It is thus described by Mr. Watkins (Conv. c. xvi.): When a person has an interest in lands, and grants a portion of that interest, or in other terms, a less estate than he has in himself, the possession of those lands shall, on the determination of the granted interest or estate, return or revert to the grantor. This interest is what is called the grantor's reversion, or, more properly, his right of reverter, which, however, is deemed an actual estate in the land, bearing the fruits of seignory. Thus, a grant of an estate by the owner of the fee-simple 'to A. for life,' leaves in the grantor the reversion in fee-simple, which will commence in possession after the determination of A's life-estate; and this is called the particular estate; particular as carved or sliced out of the larger estate or reversion.

This right of reverter arises by construction of law; it cannot be created by the act of the parties, and if before the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 3, a person made a lease for life, remainder to his own right heirs, the remainder was void, and the lessor took the reversion, but since this Act he takes the remainder in fee by purchase. A reversion, being an immediate interest, may be granted over to another person; it may be charged, and is also devisable, and liable to its owner's debts, and to the leases of prior tenants-in-tail. Although a person can only be said to be entitled to, not seised of, a reversion, yet reversions are vested interests which may be aliened and charged much in the same manner as estates in possession.—Wiscot's case, 2 Rep. 61. A reversion expectant on an estate for years is present assets for the payment of debts; while it is quasi assets when expectant on a life-estate, and only assets when it comes into possession after an estate-tail, since the tenant-in-tail may bar it.—2 Com. Dig. 339.

The usual incidents to every reversion are fealty and rent, because the grantee of the particular estate holds as tenant of the reversioner.

When rent is not reserved on the particular estate, fealty, however, results of course, as an incident quite inseparable; and when rent is reserved, it is also an incident, though not inseparably so, to the reversion. The rent may be granted to another, and the reversion retained, and the reversion may be granted to another, specially reserving the rent; but by a general grant of the reversion the rent will pass by it as incident thereto, though by a grant of the rent generally the reversion will not pass. The incident (which is a thing appertaining to or following another, as more worthy or principal) passes by the grant of the principal, but not è converso; for the maxim of law is accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur, suum principale.

As the creation of a particular estate is absolutely essential to give existence to a reversion, so the continuation of the reversion depends upon the continuance of the particular estate; for if, by any means, as by forfeiture, surrender, or regular expiration, such particular estate determine, the interest of the grantor must necessarily cease to be an estate in reversion, and will become an estate in possession, into which he may immediately enter. Any particular estate may merge in a reversion, unless it be an estate-tail.

A man will not be entitled to tenancy by the curtesy of, nor a woman to dower out of, a reversion or remainder expectant upon an estate of freehold; but upon a reversion expectant upon an estate for years, both these rights (of dower and of curtesy) accrue (Stoughton v. Leigh, 1 Taunt. 410); for the possession of the tenant for years constitutes a legal seisin of the freehold in reversion (De Gray v. Richardson, 3 Atk. 470; Goodtitle v. Newman, 3 Wils. 521).

In order to assist such persons as have any estate in remainder, reversion, or expectancy, after the death of others, against fraudulent concealments of their deaths, it is enacted by the statute 6 Anne, c. 18, that all persons on whose lives any lands or tenements are holden, shall (upon application to the Court of Chancery and order made thereupon) once in every year, if required, be produced to the court, or its commissioners; or, upon neglect or refusal, they shall be taken to be actually dead, and the person entitled to such expectant estate may enter upon and hold the lands and tenements till the party shall appear to be living. See 2 Prest. on Abstracts, p. 83, et seq.

Reversionary, that which is to be enjoyed in succession.

Reversionary interests of married women in personalty. See HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Reversionary lease, one to take effect in futuro. A second lease to commence after the expiration of a former lease. All leases where a particular estate subsists are leases in reversion.—Woodf. L. and T. 150, 151, 159.

Reversioner, one who has a reversion.

Reversio terræ est tanquam terra revertens in possessione donatori, sive hæredibus suis post donum finitum.—Co. Litt. 142.—(A reversion of land is as it were the return of the land to the possession of the donor or his heirs after the termination of the estate granted.)

Reversor, a debtor who makes a wadset; a reversioner.

Reverter, reversion.

Re, verbis, scripto, consensu, traditione, junctura, vestes sumere pacta solent.—Plow. Com. 161 b.—(Compacts are accustomed to be made by the thing itself, by words, by writing, by consent, by delivery, by hand-sale.)

Review, Bill of, it is in the nature of proceedings in error, and its object is to procure an examination and alteration or reversal of a final decree in Chancery duly signed and enrolled. If the decree be not enrolled, a petition of rehearing is the proper proceeding.

The bill is filed either for error of law, apparent upon the face of the decree, without any further examination of matters of fact (as for being contrary to the statute-law, or unwarranted by the allegations in the bill); or, with leave of the court, upon the discovery of new matter as a release or receipt: which leave (though discretionary with the court) is obtained upon an attendable petition and an affidavit, stating that the new matter could not be produced or used by the party claiming the benefit of it in the original cause, and also stating the nature of the new matter, in order that the court may exercise its judgment upon its relevancy and materiality. The matter must not only be new, but such as the party, by the use of reasonable diligence, could not have known; for negligence would destroy all claim to the relief.

The bill should state the former bill, and the proceedings under it; the decree, and the point in which the party exhibiting the bill conceives himself aggrieved by it; the ground of relief, or matter discovered, upon which he seeks to impeach the decree. Should the decree be impeached on the latter ground, it then seems necessary to state the leave obtained to file it, and the fact of the discovery.

The bill may simply pray that the decree may be reviewed, and reversed in the point complained of, if it has not been carried into execution; but if it has, the bill may also pray the further decree of the court, to place the party complaining of the former decree in the situation in which he would have been if such decree had not been executed. If a bill be brought to review the reversal of a former decree, it should then pray that the original decree may stand.

To entitle a person to bring this bill, it is necessary that he should have obeyed and performed the decree, unless the act decreed to be done would extinguish his right at the common law, in which case the court would make an order to dispense with its performance until the hearing of the bill of review. The filing of this bill does not prevent the execution of the decree impeached; an order of the court should be obtained to stay it.

No persons, except the parties and their privies in representation, such as heirs, executors, and administrators, are entitled to this bill, which should be filed within twenty years after the decree. The sum of 50*l.* must be deposited with the registrar, to answer costs upon the filing. See Consol. Ord. 1860, xxi., 2, which also includes a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review. See Morgan's Chancery Acts and Orders, 506.

Review, Bill in the nature of bill of, this is filed where the decree has not been enrolled. As, however, a decree not signed and enrolled may be altered or reversed upon a rehearing, without the assistance of such bill, if there is sufficient matter to alter or reverse it appearing upon the former proceedings, the new investigation of the decree must be, or at least usually is, brought on by a petition for a rehearing, when there is no defect to be supplied. Sto. Eq. Pl. s. 421.

Review, Supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of. It nearly resembles, in its frame, a bill of review, except that, instead of praying that the former decree may be reviewed or reversed, it prays that the cause may be heard with respect to the new matter made the subject of the supplemental bill, at the same time that it is reheard upon the original bill, and that the plaintiff may have such relief as the nature of the case made by the supplemental bill requires. Story's Eq. Plead. s. 425.

Review, Commission of, a commission which was sometimes granted in extraordinary cases, to revise the sentence of the court of delegates, when it was apprehended they had been led into a material error. The court of delegates is abolished.

Review, Court of, the appeal-court from the Commissioners in Bankruptcy, established by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 56. It adjudicated upon such matters in bankruptcy as before were within the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor. An appeal lay to the Lord Chancellor on matters of law and equity, or on the rejection or admission of evidence. This court was abolished by 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, and its jurisdiction subsequently transferred to the appeal-court in Chancery, by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, s. 7.

Reviling church ordinances, an offence against religion, punishable by fine and imprisonment.—4 Step. Com. 287.

Revising Barristers' Courts, courts held in the autumn throughout the country, to revise the list of voters for county and borough members of Parliament. An appeal lies to the Court of Common Pleas, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18.

Revivor, Bill of, a bill filed to revive and continue the proceedings, whenever there was an abatement of the suit before its final consummation, either by death or marriage. Bills of Revivor are virtually abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52. See ORDER OF REVIVOR.

Revivor, Bill in the nature of a bill of. The distinction between bills of revivor and bills in the nature of bills of revivor, seemed to be, that the former, in case of death, were founded upon mere privity of blood or representation by operation of law; the latter upon privity of estate or title by the act of the party. In the former case, nothing could be in contest, except where the party was heir or personal representative; in the latter, the nature and operation of the whole act, by which the privity of estate or title was created, was open to controversy.

Revivor and Supplement, Bill of. This bill was a mere compound of the two preceding species of bills, and in its separate parts it must have been framed and proceeded upon in the same manner. It was resorted to where not only an abatement had taken place in a suit, but defects were to be supplied, or new events were to be stated which had arisen since the commencement of the suit. Thus, if a suit became abated, and by any fact other than the event by which the abatement happened, the rights of the parties were affected, as by a settlement or a devise, under certain circumstances, though a mere bill of revivor might continue the suit, so as to enable the parties to prosecute it, yet to bring before the court the whole matter necessary for its consideration, the parties must, by supplemental bill, added to and made part of the bill of revivor, have shown the settlement or devise, or other act by which their rights were affected.—Story's Eq. Plead. 309.

Revivor, Order of. See ORDER OF REVIVOR.

Revivor, Writ of. In cases where it shall become necessary to revive a judgment, by reason either of lapse of time, or of a change by death or otherwise, of the parties entitled or liable to execution, the party alleging himself to be entitled to execution may either sue out a writ of revivor in the form set forth in the Act, or apply to the court or a judge for leave to enter a suggestion upon the roll, to the effect that it manifestly appears to the court that such party is entitled to have execution of the judgment, and to issue execution thereupon; such leave to be granted by the court or a judge upon a rule to show cause or a summons, to be served according to the present practice, or in such other manner as such court or a judge may direct, and which rule or summons may be in the form contained in the schedule (A) to the Act annexed, marked No. 7, or to the like effect.—C. L. P. A. (1852), s. 129.

Upon such application, in case it manifestly appears that the party making the same is entitled to execution, the court or judge shall allow such suggestion as aforesaid to be entered in the form contained in schedule A to the Act annexed, marked No. 8, or to the like effect, and execution to issue thereupon; and shall order whether or not the costs of such application shall be paid to the party making the same; and in case it does not manifestly so appear, the court or judge shall discharge the rule or dismiss the summons, with or without costs; provided, nevertheless, that in such last-mentioned case, the party making such application shall be at liberty to proceed by writ of revivor or action upon the judgment (s. 130).

The writ of revivor shall be directed to the party called upon to show cause why execution should not be awarded, and shall bear teste on the day of its issuing; and after reciting the reason why such writ has become necessary, it shall call upon the party to whom it is directed to appear within eight days after service thereof, in the court out of which it issues, to show cause why the party at whose instance such writ has been issued should not have execution against the party to whom such writ is directed, and it shall give notice that, in default of appearance, the party issuing such writ may proceed to execution, and such writ may be in the form contained in schedule A to the Act annexed, marked No. 9, or to the like effect, and may be served in any county, and otherwise proceeded upon, whether in term or vacation, in the same manner as a writ of summons; and the venue in a declaration upon such writ may be laid in any county, and the pleadings and proceedings thereupon, and the rights of the parties respectively to costs, shall be the same as in an ordinary action (s. 131).

Notice in writing to the plaintiff, his attorney or agent, shall be sufficient appearance to a writ of revivor (s. 132).

A writ of revivor to revive a judgment less than ten years old shall be allowed without any rule or order; if more than ten years old, not without a rule of court or a judge's order; nor, if more than fifteen, without a rule to show cause (s. 134).

A plaintiff shall not be allowed a rule to quash his own writ of scire facias or revivor, after a defendant has appeared, except on payment of costs.—H. T. 1853, r. 78. See Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1125.

Revocation, the calling back of a thing granted; or a destroying or making void of some deed that had existence until the act of revocation made it void. It may be either general, of all acts and things done before; or special, to revoke a particular thing.—5 Rep. 90.

Revocation and new appointment. The appointer may reserve a power of revocation and new appointment in the deed of appointment, although not expressly authorized so to do, by the assurance creating the power; and such a power may be reserved toties quoties. By a revocation the original power revives. When a deed of appointment contains no power of revocation, it is absolute and cannot be revoked, although there be a power of revocation in the assurance creating the power. When a power is executed by will, an express power of revocation need not be reserved, since a will is revocable.

Revocation of agency. An agency is dissolved or determined in several ways:—

(I.) By the act of the principal, either

(a) Express, as

(1) By direct and formal writing, publicly advertized;

(2) By informal writing to the agent privately;

(3) By parol; or

(b) Implied from circumstances, as by appointing another person to do the same act, where the authority of both would be incompatible.

The exceptions to the power of the principal to revoke his agent's authority at mere pleasure, are

(2) Where an authority or power is coupled with an interest, or where it is given for a valuable consideration, or where it is a part of a security, unless there is an express stipulation that it shall be revocable.

(3) When an agent's act in pursuance of his authority has become obligatory, for nemo potest mutare consilium suum in alterius injuriam.

(II.) By the agent's giving notice to his principal that he renounces the agency; but the principal must sustain no damage thereby; otherwise the agent would be responsible therefor.

(III.) By operation of law, as (a) By the expiration of the period during which the agency was to exist or to have effect.

(b) By a change of condition or of state, producing an incapacity of either the principal or the agent, as:—

(1) Marriage of a feme sole, principal.

(2) Mental disability established by inquisition, or where the party is placed under guardianship.

(3) Bankruptcy, excepting as to such rights as do not pass to the assignees under the adjudication.

(4) Death, unless the authority is coupled with an interest in the thing vested in the agent. See Bailey v. Collett, 18 Beav. 179.

(5) By the extinction of the subject of the agency.

(6) By the ceasing of the principal's power.

(7) By the complete execution of the trust confided to the agent, who then is functus officio.

Revocation of probate and letters of administration. This is effected in two ways: (1) on a suit by citation; (2) on an appeal to a higher tribunal to reverse the sentence by which they are granted.—1 Wms. Exs. 493, et seq.

Revocation of will. There are now only four modes in which a will can be revoked, viz.: (1) by another inconsistent will, or writing executed in the same manner as the original will; (2) by burning, or any other act of the same nature, done animo revocandi; (3) by the disposition of the property by the testator in his lifetime; (4) by marriage. By the 1st and 3rd of these modes, the will may be revoked either entirely or partially; by the second and last, the revocation will be total.—St. Leon V. and P. 385; 1 Wms. Exs. 109.

Revocatione parliamenti, an ancient writ for recalling a parliament.—4 Inst. 44.

Revocatur [Lat.] (it is recalled).

Reward, a recompense for anything done.

In order to encourage the apprehending of certain felons, rewards and immunities were heretofore bestowed on such as brought them to justice, by several statutes. Most of them have been repealed.

By 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 89, s. 8, persons discovering or apprehending any offender concealing or embezzling royal stores, or being guilty of any offence against that Act or the 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 41, not prosecuted in a summary way, shall, on conviction, receive a reward of 20*l.* over the share of penalty, if not more than that sum.

The 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 28, enables the courts to order the sheriff of the county in which certain enumerated offences have been committed, to pay to the person active in or towards the apprehension of persons charged with murder, felonies, shooting, or attempting to shoot, stabbing, cutting, or poisoning, or administering anything to procure miscarriage, or with rape, burglary, or felonious housebreaking, bullock stealing, or sheep stealing, or with being accessory before the fact to any of such offences, or to receiving, knowingly, any stolen property, such sum as to the court shall seem reasonable, and sufficient to compensate such person for their expense, exertion, and loss of time. By section 29, such orders are directed to be paid by the sheriff, who shall be forthwith reimbursed by the treasury. By section 30, if a man be killed in attempting to take such offenders, the court may order compensation to his wife or relatives. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16, s. 13.

As to taking a reward for helping to the recovery of stolen property without bringing the offender to trial, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 101. As to advertising a reward for the return of stolen or lost property, see ADVERTISING FOR STOLEN OR LOST PROPERTY.

Rider-roll, a schedule, or small piece of parchment, often added to some part of a roll, record, or Act of Parliament.

Riding armed. The offence of riding or going armed with dangerous or unusual weapons, is a misdemeanor tending to disturb the public peace by terrifying the good people of the land.—4 Step. Com. 337.

Riding clerk, one of the six clerks in Chancery, who, in his turn, for one year, kept the controlment books of all grants that passed the Great Seal. The six clerks were superseded by the clerks of records and writs.

Ridings [corrupted from trithings], the names of the parts or divisions of Yorkshire, which, of course, are three only, viz. East Riding, North Riding, and West Riding.

Riens in arrear, a plea used in an action of debt for arrearages of account, whereby the defendant alleges that there is nothing in arrear.

Riens passe per le fait (nothing passes by the deed), the form of an exception taken in some cases to an action on a deed.

Riens per descent (nothing by descent), the plea of an heir where he is sued for his ancestor's debts, and has no land from him by descent or assets in his hands.—3 Cro. 151.

Rier or Reer-county [fr. retro-comitatus, Lat.], close county, in opposition to open county. It appears to be some public place which the sheriff appoints for the receipt of the king's money after the end of the county court. Fleta says it is dies crastinus post comitatum.—Encyc. Lond.

Rifflare [fr. reife, Sax.], to take away any thing by force.

Right [fr. recht, Germ. and Teut.; ritto, Ital.; rectus, Lat. The application of the same word to denote a straight line and moral rectitude of conduct, has obtained in every language I know.—Dugald Stewart], in its primitive sense, that which the law directs; in popular acceptation, that which is so directed for the protection and advantage of an individual, is said to be his right.—1 Stark. Evid. 1, n. (b.) In other words, it is a liberty of doing or possessing something consistently with law.

Right close, Writ of, an abolished writ which lay for tenants in ancient demesne, and others of a similar nature, to try the right of their lands and tenements in the court of the lord exclusively.

Right in court. See RECTUS IN CURIÂ.

Right of discussion, the right which a cautioner or surety has to insist that the creditor shall do his best to compel the performance of the contract by the principal debtor, before he shall be called upon.—Scotch Law.

Right of division, the right which each of several cautioners or sureties has to refuse to answer for more than his own share of the debt.

To entitle the cautioner to his right, the other cautioner must be solvent, and there must be no words in the bond to exclude it.—Ibid.

Right of relief, the right which a cautioner or surety has against the principal debtor, when he has been compelled to pay the debt.—Ibid.

Right patent. An obsolete writ, which was brought for lands and tenements, and not for an advowson, or common, and lay only for an estate in fee-simple, and not for him who had a lessor estate, as tenant-in-tail, tenant-in-frank-marriage, or tenant for life.—F. N. B. 1.

Right to begin. If the affirmative of the issue is on the plaintiff, he, as a general rule, has a right to begin. In replevin, any issue in which the affirmative is on the plaintiff entitles him to begin. And if, in replevin, the defendant avow for rent in arrear, and the plaintiff reply riens in arrear, the plaintiff must begin. If the affirmative of any one material issue is on the plaintiff, and he undertakes to give evidence upon it, he is entitled to begin. In general, if the affirmative of the issue lies on the defendant, and there is not a judgment by default as to part, and the plaintiff does not seek to recover unascertained damages, the defendant is to begin. In cases of slander, libel, and other actions for personal injuries, where the plaintiff seeks to recover actual damages of an unascertained amount, he is entitled to begin, although the affirmative of the issue may in point of form be with the defendant. And this is now decided to be the rule in other cases, where the plaintiff seeks to recover unascertained damages.

In considering, however, which party ought to begin, it is not so much the form of the issue which is to be considered, as the substance and effect of it, and the judge will consider what is the substantial fact to be made out, and on whom it lies to make it out. And it seems that, as a general rule, the party entitled to begin is he who would have a verdict against him if no evidence were given on either side.

On a plea in abatement for non-joinder, the defendant's counsel was formerly considered as in general entitled to begin; but it has since been settled to be otherwise, unless the damages are admitted.

In ejectment, by an heir-at-law, against a devisee, the latter admitting the seisin of the ancestor, and that the plaintiff is heir, is entitled to begin.

By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 41, it is provided that, at the trial of any proceeding by scire facias to repeal letters-patent, the defendant shall be entitled to begin, and to give evidence in support of such letters-patent, and in case evidence shall be adduced on the part of the prosecutor impeaching the validity of such letters-patent, the defendant shall be entitled to the reply.

A new trial will not be granted because a judge has wrongly ruled at nisi prius as to which party was entitled to begin, unless such ruling did clear and manifest injustice. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 383.

On the hearing of a petition of appeal or rehearing in Chancery, the appellant's counsel is entitled to begin, excepting where a defendant appeals from the whole of a decree. On an appeal from the whole of an order made on a claim and on a motion for decree, the plaintiff is entitled to begin.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 485.

Right, Writ of [breve de recto, Lat.], the highest writ in the law, sometimes called, to distinguish it from others of the droitural class, the writ of right proper. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Rights, Bill of. See Bill of Rights.

Rights, Petition of. See Petition of Rights.

Ring-dropping, a trick thus practised:—The prisoner, with some accomplices, being in company with the prosecutor, pretends to find a valuable ring wrapped up in paper, appearing to be a jeweller's receipt for a 'rich brilliant diamond ring.' They offer to leave the ring with the prosecutor, if he will deposit some money and his watch, as a security. The prosecutor having accordingly laid down his watch and money on a table, is beckoned out of the room by one of the confederates, while the others take away his watch and money. This amounts to a larceny.—2 East. Pl. 678.

Ringing the changes, a trick practised by a criminal, by which, on receiving a good piece of money in payment of an article, he pretends it is not good, and, changing it, returns to the buyer a counterfeit one, as in the following case:—The prosecutor having bargained with the prisoner, who was selling fruit about the streets, to have five apricots for sixpence, gave him a good shilling to change. The prisoner put the shilling into his mouth, as if to bite it in order to try its goodness, and returning a shilling to the prosecutor, told him it was a bad one. The prosecutor gave him another good shilling, which he also affected to bite, and then returned another shilling, saying it was a bad one. The prosecutor gave him another good shilling, with which he practised this trick a third time; the shillings returned by him being in every respect bad. This was held to be an uttering of false money.—1 Russ. on Cr. 114.

Riot, a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful. The punishment for riots not falling within the provisions of the Riot Act, is fine and imprisonment, to which hard labour may, by 3 Geo. IV. c. 114, be superadded.

As to riots at elections, see 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 70.

Riot Act, 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5, amended as to punishment, by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 99, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3.

Riotous assembling. If twelve or more persons assemble unlawfully, to the disturbance of the peace, and do not disperse after proclamation, they are felons. See Riot Act.

Riotously demolishing Buildings or Machinery. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 11, it is enacted that if any persons riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, shall unlawfully and with force demolish, or pull down, or destroy, or begin to demolish, pull down, or destroy any church, chapel, meeting-house, or other place of divine worship, or any house, stable, coachhouse, outhouse, warehouse, office, shop, mill, malthouse, hop vat, barn, grannery, shed, hovel, or fold, or any building or erection used in farming land, or in carrying on any trade or manufacture, or any part thereof, or any building other than such as are in this section before mentioned belonging to the Queen, or to any county, riding, division, city, borough, poor-law union, parish, or place, or belonging to any university, or college, or hall of any university, or to any inn of court, or devoted or dedicated to public use or ornament, or erected or maintained by public subscription or contribution, or any machinery, whether fixed or movable, prepared for, or employed in, any manufacture or in any branch thereof, or any steam engine or other engine for sinking, working, ventilating, or draining any mine, or any staith building or erection used in conducting the business of any mine, or any bridge, waggon-way, or truck for conveying minerals from any mine, every such offender shall be guilty of felony, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement. By sec. 12, if any persons, riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, shall unlawfully and with force injure or damage any such church, &c. as in the last preceding section mentioned, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, provided that if upon the trial of any person for any felony in the last preceding section mentioned, the jury shall not be satisfied that he is guilty thereof, but shall be satisfied that he is guilty of any offence in this section mentioned, then the jury may find him guilty thereof, and he may be punished accordingly.

By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 23, if any church, or chapel, house, or such buildings or machinery, as in the Act mentioned, shall be feloniously demolished, wholly or in part, by persons riotously and tumultuously assembled, the inhabitants of the hundred shall be liable to yield full compensation, provided that the persons damnified, or such of them as have knowledge of the circumstances, or the servants who had the care of the property, shall, within seven days, go before some justice of the peace, residing near and having jurisdiction, and state upon oath the names of the offenders, if known, and submit to examination touching the circumstances, and become bound by recognizance to prosecute; and provided also, that any action against the hundred be commenced within three calendar months after the offence.

See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 72, as to the riotous destruction of threshing machines; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 477, as to the plunder and destruction of ships or boats stranded or in distress.

Riparia, a river, or water running between banks.

Riparian nations, those who possess opposite banks or different parts of banks of one and the same river.—Inter. Law.

Riparian proprietors, owners of lands bounded by a river or water-course.

Ripon, Bishopric of, created pursuant to the report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

Riptowell, a gratuity or reward given to tenants after they had reaped their lord's corn.

Ripuarian laws, a code of laws belonging to the Franks who occupied the country upon the Rhine.

Rivage, or Rivagium, a toll anciently paid to the Crown for the passage of boats or vessels on certain rivers.

Riveare, to have the liberty of a river for fishing and fowling.

Rivers, injuries to, common nuisances. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 30 & 31.

Rixa, a dispute, a quarrel.—Civ. Law.

Rixatrix communis, a common scold.—4 Step. Com. 357.

Road, a way, or passage; a secure place for the anchoring of vessels.

Robbery, the unlawful and forcible taking, from the person of another, of goods or money, to any value, by violence or putting him in fear.

(1) There must be an unlawful taking, otherwise it is no robbery.

(2) It is immaterial of what value the thing taken is.

(3.) The taking must be by force or by a previous putting in fear, which makes the violation of the person more atrocious than privately stealing. For, according to the civil law maxim, qui vi rapuit, fur improbior esse videtur. This previous violence or putting in fear is the criterion that distinguishes robbery from other larcenies.—4 Step. Com. 208–213.

Roberdsman, or Robertsman, a bold and stout robber or night thief, so called from Robin Hood, the famous robber, but perhaps a corruption of 'robber's man.'

Robes, Master of the, an officer of the household, who has the ordering of the sovereign's robes. He has several officers under him, as a clerk of the robes, a yeoman, three grooms, a page, a brusher, furrier, sempstress, laundress, starcher, and standing wardrobe-keepers, at St. James's, Windsor Castle, Hampton Court, &c. There are also a mistress of the robes and two keepers of the robes.

Rod, a measure of sixteen feet and a half long, otherwise called a perch.

Rod Knights, certain servitors who held their land by serving their lords on horseback.

Roe, Richard, the casual ejector and fictitious defendant in ejectment whose services are no longer invoked. See EJECTMENT.

Rogation [fr. rogatio, Lat.], the demand by the consul or tribunes of a law to be passed by the people.—Civ. Law.

Rogationes, quæstiones, et positiones debent esse simplices.—Hob. 143.—(Demands, questions, and claims, ought to be simple.)

Rogation week [fr. rogando (Deum), Lat., petitioning or supplicating God], the second week before Whit Sunday, thus called from three fasts observed therein, the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, called rogation days, because of the extraordinary prayers and processions then made for the fruits of the earth, or as a preparation for the devotion of Holy Thursday.

Rogatio testium, bidding persons present to be witnesses to a nuncupative will.—1 Wm. Exs. 105.

Rogatory letters, a commission from one judge to another requesting him to examine a witness.

Rogue [Horne Tooke pronounces it to be the past participle of the Saxon wrigan, and means covered, cloaked.—Div. of Purley, ii. 227. Rogues in our old books are 'sturdy beggars.' This is the earliest acceptation of the word. I conceive it therefore to descend from the Dutch prachgen, to go a begging, whence our prog, written also progue, a word of bad meaning; and thence, omitting p, the word before us.—Todd], a wandering beggar, vagrant, vagabond. See VAGRANCY.

Rogus, a funeral-pile; a great fire wherein dead bodies were burned; a pile of wood.—Claus. 5 Hen. III.

Rôle d'équipage [Fr.], the list of a ship's crew; a muster-roll.

Roll, a schedule of parchment that may be turned up with the hand in the form of a pipe. All pleadings, memorials, and acts of court are entered on rolls, and filed with the proper officers, and then they become records of the court.

Roll of Court, the court-roll in a manor, wherein the business of the court, the admissions, surrenders, names, rents, and services of the tenants are copied and enrolled.

Rolls, Master of the. See MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

Rolls Office of the Chancery, an office in Chancery Lane, London, which contains rolls and records of the High Court of Chancery, the master whereof is the second person in the Chancery, &c. The Rolls Court is here held when the Master of the Rolls sits.

This house or office was anciently called Domus Conversorum, as being appointed, by King Henry III. for the use of converted Jews, but their irregularities occasioned King Edward II. to expel them thence, upon which the place was deputed for the custody of the rolls.—Encyc. Lond.

Rolls of the Exchequer. There are several in this court relating to the revenue of the country.

Rolls of Parliament, the manuscript registers of the proceedings of our old Parliament; in these rolls are likewise a great many decisions of difficult points of law, which were frequently, in former times, referred to the determination of this supreme court by the judges of both benches, &c.

Rolls of the Temple. In each of the two Temples is a roll called the calves-head roll, wherein every bencher, barrister, and student is taxed yearly; also, meals to the cook and other officers of the houses, in consideration of a dinner of calves-head, provided in Easter term.—Orig. Jurid. 199.

Roman Catholics, Relief of. There are several statutes upon this subject, the principal of which are, 10 Geo. IV. c. 7; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59; and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, s. 6.

Roman Catholics (the) Charities Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 134.

Roman Civil Law. See CIVIL LAW.

Roman Law of Descartes. See Hale's Hist. p. 29.

Roma-Peditæ, pilgrims that travelled to Rome on foot.

Rome, Diplomatic relations with, are expressly authorized by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 108.

Rome-scot, or Rome-penny, Peterpence, which see.

Romilly's Act, 52 Geo. III. c. 101, as to charity abuses.—Lewin's Trusts, 779. See CHARITY.

Romney Marsh, a tract of land, in Kent, governed by certain ancient and equitable laws of sewers, from which commissioners of sewers may receive light and direction.—4 Inst. 276.

Rood, or Holy Rood, holy cross.

Rood of land, the fourth part of an acre in square measure, or 1,210 square yards.

Rooks are animals, feræ naturæ. See Hannam v. Mockett, 2 B & C. 934.

Rope-dancers. Unlicensed booths and stages, for rope-dancers and mountebanks, are public nuisances, and may, upon indictment, be suppressed, and the keepers of them fined.—1 Hawk. P. C. 75, s. 6. But see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, s. 3.

Roulette and Rolypoly. See GAMING.

Ros, a kind of rushes, which some tenants were obliged by their tenure to furnish their lords with.

Rosland, heathy ground, or ground full of ling; also, watery and moorish land.—1 Inst. 5.

Roster, a list of persons, who are to perform certain legal duties when called upon in their turn.

Rother-beasts, oxen, cows, steers, heifers, and such like horned animals.

Rotulus Wintoniæ (the roll of Winton), an exact survey of all England, made by Alfred, not unlike that of Domesday; and it was so called for that it was kept at Winchester, among other records of the kingdom; but this roll time has destroyed.—Ingulph. Hist. 516.

Round-robin, a circle divided from the centre, like Arthur's round table, whence its supposed origin. In each compartment is a signature, so that the entire circle, when filled, exhibits a list, without priority being given to any name. It is the mode in which British sailors petition their superiors.

Rout, a disturbance of the peace by persons assembling with an intention to do a thing, which, if it be executed, will make them rioters, and actually making a motion towards its execution.

Roy, Royan, a Hindoo title, given to the principal officer of the Khalsa, or chief treasurer of the Exchequer.—Indian.

Royal assent, the act by which the Crown agrees to a bill which has already passed both Houses, is called 'The Royal Assent,' which may be given by the Sovereign in person, robed, crowned, and seated on the throne in the House of Lords, the Commons standing at the bar; or by Commissioners appointed by the Crown for that special purpose and for the single occasion. The forms observed in both cases do not vary, and are as follow: The Lords being assembled in their own House, the Sovereign or the Commissioners seated, and the Commons at the bar, the titles of the several bills which have passed both Houses are read, and the King's or Queen's answer is declared by the Clerk of the Parliaments in Norman-French. To a bill of supply, the assent is given in the following words: 'Le roy (or, la reine) remercie ses loyal subjects, accepte leur benevolence et ainsi le veut.' To a private bill it is thus declared: 'Soit fait comme il est desiré.' And to public general bills it is given in these terms: 'Le roy (or, la reine) le veut.' Should the Sovereign refuse assent, it is in the gentle language of 'Le roy (or, la reine) s'avisera.' As acts of grace and amnesty originate with the Crown, the clerk, expressing the gratitude of the subject, addresses the throne as follows: 'Les prélats, seigneurs, et commons, en ce présent Parliament assemblés aŭ nom de tout vous autres subjects remercient très humblement votre majesté et prient à Dieu vous donner en santé bonne vie et longue.' The moment the royal assent has been given, that which was a bill becomes an Act, and instantly has the force and effect of law, unless some time for the commencement of its operation should have been specially appointed.

Queen Elizabeth, at the end of one session, rejected 48 bills agreed to by both Houses. The power of rejection was exercised in the year 1692, by William III., who at first refused, but in two years afterwards yielded assent to the bill for triennial parliaments; and for the last time in 1707, when Queen Anne refused her assent to a Scotch militia bill.—Dod's Parl. Comp. 94.

Royal burghs, incorporations in Scotland, created by royal charter, giving jurisdiction to the magistrates within certain bounds, and vesting certain privileges in the inhabitants and burgesses. A burgh is called a royal burgh if it hold of the Crown; if it hold of a subject it is termed a burgh of barony.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 46; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 77, explained by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 87.

Royal fish. See REGAL FISH.

Royal forces, the army, navy, marines, and militia.

Royal grants, conveyances of record. They are of two kinds: (1) letters-patent, and (2) letters-close, or writs-close

Royal Marriage Act, 12 Geo. III. c. 11.

Royal mines, gold and silver mines.

Royalties, regalities, royal property.

Roy est l'original de touts franchises.—Keilw. 138.—(The king is the original of all franchises.)

Roy n'est lie per ascun statute si il ne soit expressment nosme.—Jenk Cent. 307.—(The king is not bound by any statute, unless expressly named.)

Roy poet dispenser ove malum prohibitum, mais non malum per se.—Ibid.—(The king can grant a dispensation for a malum prohibitum, but not for a malum per se.)

Rubric, directions printed in books of law and in prayer-books, so termed because they were originally distinguished by red ink.

Rubric of a statute, its title, which was anciently printed in red letters. It serves to show the object of the legislature, and thence affords the means of interpreting the body of the act. Hence the phrase of an argument, à rubro ad nigrum.

Rubricas, constitutions of the church founded upon the statutes of uniformity and public prayer, viz. 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 2; 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4.

Rudmas-day [fr. rode, Sax., cross, and mass-day], the feast of the holy cross. There are two of these feasts: one on the third of May, the Invention of the Cross; and the other on the fourteenth of September, called the Holy Rood-day, the Exaltation of the Cross.

Ruffanamah, an agreement.—Indian.

Rules, guides or decisions; also orders regulating the practice of the courts, or orders made between parties to an action or suit.

At common law, rules on the plea side of the courts are common, being obtained from the master, without motions by counsel; or special, obtained upon motion by counsel.

Those granted upon motion by counsel may be classed under the following heads: 1st. Those which are granted upon the motion-paper, being merely signed by counsel without any motion being actually made in court. 2ndly. Those which are considered so much as a matter of course, that the grounds of the motion are not particularised by counsel, and where, in some instances, counsel may hand the motion-paper to one of the masters, without making the motion vivâ voce; and, 3rdly. Those which are granted upon the grounds of the motion being particularised by counsel.

The first class of the above rules are absolute in the first instance; the second and third are either absolute in the first instance, or rules to show cause, commonly called rules nisi, which are made absolute after service, unless good cause shown to the contrary.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1564.

Rule in Shelley's case. See SHELLEY'S CASE.

Runcaria, land full of brambles and briars.—1 Inst. 5 a.

Runcilus, Runcinus, a load-horse, sumpter-horse, cart-horse.—Cowel.

Rundlet, or Runlet, a measure of wine, oil, &c., containing eighteen gallons and a half.—1 R. III. c. 13.

Running-days. See LAY DAYS.

Running with the land, said of a covenant-real, which affects real property.

Runrig lands. Lands in Scotland where the ridges of a field belong alternately to different proprietors. Anciently, this kind of possession was advantageous in giving an united interest to tenants to resist inroads. By the Act 1695, c. 23, a division of these lands was authorized, with the exception of lands belonging to corporations.

Rupee, a silver coin, rated at 2*s.* for the current, and 2*s.* 3*d.* for the Bombay, rupee.—Indian.

Ruptarii, or Ruttarii, soldiers, or rather robbers.

Ruptura, arable land, or ground broke up.

Rural deanery, the circuit of an archdeacon's and rural dean's jurisdiction. Every rural deanery is divided into parishes.

Rural Deans, very ancient officers of the church, but, until recently, almost grown out of use, though their deaneries still subsist as an ecclesiastical division of the diocese or archdeaconry. They seem to have been deputies of the bishop, planted all round his diocese, the better to inspect the conduct of the parochial clergy, to inquire into and report dilapidations, and to examine the candidates for confirmation, and armed, in minuter matters, with an inferior degree of judicial and coercive authority.—3 Step. Com. 18 & 19.

Ruse de guerre [Fr.], a trick in war, a stratagem.

Rustici, churls, clowns, or inferior country tenants, who held cottages and lands by the services of ploughing, and other labors of agriculture, for the lord. The land of such ignoble tenure was called by the Saxons gafalland, as afterwards socage tenure, and was sometimes distinguished by the name of terra rusticorum. Paroch. Antiq. 136.

Ruta, things extracted from land, as sand, chalk, coal, and such other matters.—Civ. Law.

Rutland, Statute of, 12 Edw. I.

Ryot, a peasant, subject, tenant of house or land.—Indian.

S.

Sabbath, Profanation of, commonly, but improperly, called Sabbath-breaking, an offence against religion; for it is deemed to be a violation of the divine law, both under the old and the new dispensations, and is in fact a notorious indecency and scandal. It is therefore punished by various statutes.—4 Step. Com. 292.

Sabbatum, the Sabbath; also, peace.—Domesday.

Sabbulonarium, a gravel-pit, or liberty to dig gravel and sand; also, money paid for the same.

Sable, the heraldic term for black. It is called Saturn by those who blazon by planets, and Diamond by those who use the names of jewels. Engravers commonly represent it by numerous perpendicular and horizontal lines crossing each other.

Sac, the privilege enjoyed by a lord of a manor, of holding courts, trying causes, and imposing fines.

Saca, cause, sake.

Sacaburth, Sacabere, Sakabere. He that is robbed, or by theft deprived of his money or goods, and puts in surety to prosecute the felon with fresh suit. The Scots term it sikerborgh. Spelm.

Sacculatii, cut-purses.—Roman term.

Saccus cum brochia, a service or tenure of finding a sack and a broach (pitcher) to the sovereign for the use of the army.—Bract. l. 2, c. xvi.

Sachel, or Satchel, a bag to carry papers and books.

Sacquier, an ancient officer, whose business was to load and unload vessels laden with salt, corn, or fish, to prevent the ship's crew defrauding the merchant by false tale, or cheating him of his merchandise.—Mar. Law.

Sacrament, Reviling the, an indecent and arrogant crime against religion, punished by fine and imprisonment.—1 Edw. VI. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 2; and 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 32.

Sacramentum, an oath As to the sacramenti actio of the Civil Law, see Sand. Just. 64, and Cum. C. L. 313.

Sacramentum à sacra et mente, quia jurare est Deum in testem vocare, et est actus divini cultus.—3 Inst. 165.—(An oath, 'sacra mentum,' so called from sacra, sacred, and mente, with a mind, because to swear is to call God as a witness, and is an act of divine worship.)

Sacramentum habet in se tres comites, veritatem, justitiam et judicium: veritas habenda est in jurato, justitia et judicium in judice.—3 Inst. 160.—(An oath has in it three component parts, truth, justice and judgment: truth is requisite in the party swearing, justice and judgment in the judge administering the oath.)

Sacramentum si fatuum fuerit, licet falsum, tamen non committit perjurium.—2 Inst. 167.—(A foolish oath, though false, makes not perjury.)

Sacrilege, larceny from a church. See LARCENY (3).

Sacrilegus omnium prædonum cupiditatem et scelera superat.—4 Co. 106.—(A sacrilegious person transcends the cupidity and wickedness of all other robbers.)

Sacristan, a sexton, anciently called sagerson, or sagiston; the keeper of things belonging to divine worship.

Sadberge, a denomination of part of the county-palatine of Durham.—Camd. Brit.

Sæmend, an umpire, arbitrator.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Sæpenumero ubi proprietas verborum attenditur sensus veritatis amittitur.—7 Co. 27.—(Many a time where the propriety of words is attended to, the meaning of truth is lost.)

Sæpe viatorem nova, non vetus, orbita fallit.—4 Inst. 34.—(A new road, not an old one, often deceives the traveller.)

Sævitia [Lat.], cruelty.

Safe-conduct, convoy; guard through an enemy's country. It is a prerogative of the Crown to grant safe-conducts.

Safe-guard, a protection of the Crown to one who is a stranger, that fears violence from some of its subjects, for seeking his right by course of law.—Reg. Orig. 26.

Safe-pledge, a surety appointed for one's appearance at a day assigned.—Bract. l. 4.

Sagaman, a tale-teller; secret accuser.

Sagibaro, Sachbaro, a judge.—Leg. Inæ. c. vi.

Said, aforesaid.

Sailing instructions, written or printed directions, delivered by the commanding officer of a convoy to the several masters of the ships under his care, by which they are enabled to understand and answer his signals, to know the place of rendezvous appointed for the fleet, in case of dispersion by storm, by an enemy, or by any other accident. Without sailing instructions no vessel can have the full protection and benefit of convoy.—Mar. Ins. 368.

Saint Martin le Grand, Court of. A writ of error formerly lay from the sheriff's courts in the city of London to the court of hustings, before the mayor, recorder, and sheriffs; and thence to justices appointed by the royal commission, who used to sit in the church of St. Martin le Grand; and from the judgment of those justices a writ of error lay immediately to the House of Lords.—F. N. B. 32.

Saio [fr. sagol, Sax., a staff], a tipstaff or serjeant-at-arms.

Saisie-arret [Fr.], an attachment of property in the possession of a third person.

Saladine Tenth, a tax imposed in England and France, in 1188, by Pope Innocent III. to raise a fund for the crusade undertaken by Richard I. of England, and Philip Augustus of France, against Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, then going to besiege Jerusalem.

By this tax every person who did not enter himself a crusader was obliged to pay a tenth of his yearly revenue and of the value of all his movables, except his wearing apparel, books, and arms.

The Carthusians, Bernardines, and some other religious persons, were exempted from the saladine.

Gibbon remarks, that, when the necessity for this tax no longer existed, the church still clung to it as too lucrative to be abandoned, and thus arose the tithing of ecclesiastical benefices for the benefit of the Pope or other sovereigns.—Encyc. Lond.

Salary, a recompense or consideration made to a person for his pains and industry in another person's business; also, wages, stipend, or annual allowance.—Cowel.

The ancients derive the word from sal, salt (Plin. H. n. xxxi. 41); the most necessary thing to support human life being thus mentioned as a representative of all others. Salarium, therefore, composed all the provisions with which the Roman officers were supplied, as well as their pay in money. In the time of the republic, the name salarium does not appear to have been used; it was Augustus who, in order to place the governors of provinces and other military officers in a greater state of dependence, gave salaries to them, or certain sums of money, to which afterwards various supplies in land were added. Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Salic, or Salique [lex salica, Lat.], an ancient and fundamental law of the kingdom of France, usually supposed to have been made by Pharamond, or at least by Clovis, in virtue of which males only are to reign.

Some, as Postellus, will have it to have been called Salic, q. d. Gallic, because peculiar to the Gauls. Cenal takes the reason to be, that the law was only ordained for the royal salles or palaces. Fer. Montanus insists it was because Pharamond was at first called Salicus; others, with the Abbot of Usperg, derive its name from Salogast, Pharamond's principal minister; and others from the frequent repetitions of the words si aliqua, at the beginning of the articles. The most probable opinion is that which derives the word from the ancient Franks, who were called Sali, Salici, and Salinge, on account of the Sala, a river of ancient Germany. Bouterone gives another plausible origin to the word; he says it comes from the word salich, which, in the old Teutonic language, signified salutary; and that the French in this law imitated the policy of the ancient Romans, who made salutary laws, which the magistrates were to have before them when they administered justice. This he confirms by a curious figure taken out of the Notitia Imperii, where the book is represented covered with gold, with the inscription, leges salutariæ.

It is a popular error to suppose that the Salic law was established purely on account of the succession to the Crown, since it extends to private persons as much as to the royal family.

The Salic law had not in view a preference of one sex to the other, much less had it a regard to the perpetuity of a family, a name, or the succession of land. It was purely a law of economy which gave the house, and the land dependent on the house, to the males who should dwell in it, and to whom it consequently was of more service.

In proof of this, the title of allodial lands of the Salic law is subscribed:—

(1) If a man die without issue, his father or mother shall succeed him.

(2) If he have neither father nor mother, his brother or sister shall succeed him.

(3) If he have neither brother nor sister, the sister of his mother shall succeed him.

(4) If his mother have no sister, the sister of his father shall succeed him.

(5) If his father have no sister, the nearest relation by the male shall succeed him.

(6) Not any part of the Salic land shall pass to the females, but it shall belong to the males, i. e. the male children shall succeed their father.—Encyc. Lond.; 1 Hall. M. A. note 3 to c. ii., p. 278.

Salt duty in London, a custom in the city of London called granage, formerly payable to the Lord Mayor, &c. for salt brought to the port of London, being the twentieth part.

Salt-silver, one penny paid at the feast day of St. Martin, by the tenants of some manors, as a commutation for the service of carrying their lord's salt from market to his larder.—Paroch. Antiq. 496.

Salvage, an allowance or compensation made to those by whose exertions ships or goods have been saved from the dangers of the seas, fire, pirates, or enemies.

This was allowed by the laws of Rhodes, Oleron, and Wisby, and has been allowed by all modern maritime states. At common law, the person who has saved the goods of another from loss or any imminent peril, has a lien upon them, and may retain them in his possession till payment of a reasonable salvage.

If the salvage be performed at sea, or within high or low water-mark, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over the subject, and will fix the sum to be paid, and adjust the proportions, and take care of the property pending the suit; or, if a sale be necessary, direct it to be made, and divide the proceeds between the salvors and the proprietors, according to equity and reason. In fixing the rate of salvage, the court usually has regard, not only to the labor and peril incurred by the salvors, but also to the situation in which they may happen to stand in respect of the property saved, to the promptitude and alacrity manifested by them, and to the value of the ship and cargo, as well as the degree of danger from which they were rescued. In some cases as large a proportion as a half of the property saved has been allowed as salvage; and in others not more than a tenth.

The crew of a ship are not entitled to salvage or any unusual remuneration for the extraordinary efforts they may have made in saving her; it being their duty as well as interest to contribute their utmost upon such occasions, the whole of their possible service being pledged to the master and owners. Neither are passengers entitled to claim anything for the ordinary assistance they may have been able to afford to a vessel in distress. But a passenger is not bound to remain on board a ship in the hour of danger, provided he can leave her; and if he performs any extraordinary service, he is entitled to a proportionable recompense.—Marshall on Insur. b. 1, c. 12, s. 8; Park on Insurance, c. 8; Abbott on the Law of Shipping, p. iii. c. 10; Maude and Pollock on Shipping. Satisdaction, satisfaction; suretyship.—Civ. Law.

Satisdare, to guarantee the obligation of a principal.—Civ. Law.

Satisfaction, legal compensation; the recompense for an injury done, or the payment of money due and owing.

The doctrine of satisfaction of legacies, portions, and debts, means the gift of a thing with the intention, either expressed or implied, that it is to be taken either wholly or partly in extinguishment of some prior claim or demand. Of course, it is perfectly open to a donor to expressly provide that his subsequent gift shall be a satisfaction of a prior demand which the donee may have against him, so as to prevent such donee from claiming the gift as well as the demand. With regard to implied or presumable satisfactions, they have been divided into the three following classes:—

(1) The satisfaction of legacies by portions, otherwise called the ademption of legacies. Upon this subject Lord Eldon thus laid down the rule in Ex parte Pye (18 Ves. 140), that 'where a parent (or person in loco parentis) gives a legacy to a child not stating the purpose with reference to which he gives it, the court understands him as giving a portion; and by a sort of artificial rule—upon an artificial notion, and a sort of feeling upon what is called a leaning against double portions, if the father (or quasi parent) afterwards advance a portion on the marriage, or preferment in life, of that child, though of less amount, it is a satisfaction of the whole, or in part;' i. e. if the portion be equal to or greater than the legacy, it operates a total ademption of such legacy; but if it be of a lesser amount than the legacy, such portion will then only adeem the legacy pro tanto.

But this presumption may, however, be rebutted by the fact that the testamentary portion and subsequent advancement are not ejusdem generis, e. g. as when the portion is certain, but the advancement depends upon a contingency.

Sir J. Leach, in Weall v. Rice, 2 Russ. and M. 266 (1831), stated that the following principles were to be extracted from the cases upon this point:—'Where the two provisions are of the same nature, or there are but slight differences, the two instruments afford intrinsic evidence against a double provision. Where the two provisions are of a different nature, the two instruments afford intrinsic evidence in favor of a double provision. It is not possible to define what are to be considered as slight differences between two provisions. Slight differences are such as in the opinion of the judge leave the two provisions substantially of the same nature; and every judge must decide that question for himself.'

(2) The satisfaction of a portion by a legacy. The rule is, that wherever a legacy given by a parent, or a person standing in loco parentis, is as great as, or greater than, a portion or provision previously secured to the legatee upon marriage or otherwise, then, from the already-quoted inclination of equity against double portions, a presumption arises that the legacy was intended by the testator as a complete satisfaction. When the legacy, however, is not so great as the portion or provision, it is then only a satisfaction pro tanto.—Hinchcliffe v. Hinchcliffe, 3 Ves. 516 (1797). The bequest of a whole or part of a residue will, according to its amount, be presumed either a satisfaction of a portion in full or pro tanto.

(3) The satisfaction of a debt by a legacy. If a debtor bequeath to his creditor a sum of money as great as, or greater than, the debt, without taking any notice at all of the debt, this shall be deemed a satisfaction of the debt, so that the creditor cannot have the debt and also the legacy, a doctrine founded upon the maxim, Debitor non præsumitur donâre. There is in this class of satisfaction a leaning against, as in the two former classes a leaning in favor of, the presumption. Thus, where the legacy is of lesser amount than the debt, the presumption is that it was not intended to be given in lieu of it, and is, therefore, not considered a satisfaction, even pro tanto. This presumption will also be rebutted where the legacy, though in amount equal to or greater than the debt, is payable at different times, so as not to be equally advantageous to the legatee as the payment of the debt; or where the legacy and debt are of a different nature, either with reference to the subjects themselves, or with respect to the interest given; or where the interest given is of a different nature, or not co-extensive with the debt, or where there is a particular motive assigned for the gift, or where the debt was contracted subsequently to the will, or where the legacy is contingent or uncertain, or if the debt itself be contingent or uncertain, as a debt upon an open or running account or upon a negotiable bill of exchange.

Savings' Banks, institutions for the safe custody and increase of the small savings of the industrious poor. When regulated according to Act of Parliament, certain benefits and protections are afforded to them by law. By 26 & 27 Vict. c. 87, several statutes regulating Savings' Banks were repealed, and the law relating to Savings' Banks in England and Scotland and Ireland was consolidated and amended. The institutions, sanctioned by these Acts, consist of banks to receive small deposits of money, the produce of which is to accumulate at compound interest, and the principal and interest whereof are to be paid out to the depositors as required, deducting only from the produce the necessary expenses of management. The deposits are not to exceed 30*l.* in the whole in any one year; and no fresh deposit is to be received when the sum to which the depositor is entitled amounts to 150*l.*; and where the sum standing in the name of any depositor amounts to 200*l.* (principal and interest included), no interest shall be paid on such deposit so long as it remains at that amount. The management is vested in trustees, who are prohibited from receiving directly or indirectly any benefit from the institution; and are required to invest the money deposited (beyond what necessarily remains in the hands of the treasurer to answer exigencies) in the Bank of England or Ireland, as the case may require. The monies invested are to be carried to an account kept in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and denominated 'The Fund for the Banks for Savings,' which affords interest to the trustees at the rate of 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent. per annum, the arrears of which are to be carried half-yearly to the account of the principal. The interest payable to depositors is limited to 3*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* per cent., but the Acts permit its accumulation by yearly or half-yearly rests. By way of further protection to the funds of the society, every treasurer or cashier is to give security for the due execution of his office, and in case of his refusal to account to the trustees, or to pay over the monies in his hands, may be compelled to do so, in a summary way, by petition to the justices at quarter-sessions. The trustees are also required to send to the office of the Commissioners for Reduction of the National Debt annual accounts exhibiting the balance due to the depositors, and to affix publicly to some conspicuous part of the office of the savings bank a duplicate of such account, and a list of the trustees and managers. To guard, on the other hand, against abuses of another description, no deposit is to be received without a disclosure of the name, occupation, and residence of the depositor, who is also at the same time, or at any other time, when required by the trustees, to sign a declaration that he is entitled to no benefit from any other bank of the same description; and it is provided, that if such declaration be untruly made, he shall forfeit his deposit. Provisions are also made of a nature calculated to save expense to the members of these institutions. In case of the decease of a depositor whose estate does not exceed 50*l.* no legacy duty attaches; and no stamp duty is payable on the probate or administration; and if any person die having a deposit not exceeding 50*l.* exclusive of interest, and no will or letters of administration be produced within one month afterwards, the money may be paid to or among such person or persons as shall appear to the trustees or managers to be the widow, or entitled under the statute of distributions. Upon the same principle, it is directed that the trustees may pay upon any deposit by a woman to the woman herself, unless her husband or his representative interfere, and that all disputes between the institution at large, and any of its members or representatives, shall be settled by a cheap method of arbitration pointed out for that purpose.

Any persons forming themselves into a society for the purpose of establishing a savings bank, are entitled to claim for it the benefit of the parliamentary provisions, upon causing the rules and regulations which they shall frame for its management to be entered in a book to be kept by one of its officers, for the inspection of depositors. It is, however, requisite that two copies of the rules should be submitted to a barrister officially appointed for that purpose, who is to certify whether the rules are in conformity to law and pursuant to the legislative enactments. One of the copies so certified is to be returned to the trustees, and the other is to be transmitted to the Commissioners for Reduction of the National Debt.

Friendly societies, penny savings banks, charitable and provident societies, may invest their funds to any amount in a savings bank. By 26 Vict. c. 25, provision is made for the investment of monies received by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt from the Trustees of Savings Banks.

Post-office Savings' Banks are established under the provisions of 24 Vict. c. 14, which after enacting that it is expedient to enlarge the facilities available for the deposit of small savings, and to give the direct security of the State to depositors for the re-payment of monies deposited with interest, enacts that the Postmaster-General, with the consent of the Treasury Commissioners, may direct such of his officers as he shall see fit to receive deposits for remittance to the principal office, and repay the same under such regulations as may be prescribed (s. 1). Every such deposit (which may not be of less amount than one shilling, nor of any sum not a multiple thereof) is to be entered in the depositor's book attested by the receiving officer and by the dated stamp of his office, and the amount received is to be reported on the same day to the Postmaster-General; and an acknowledgment is to be transmitted to the depositor, which is to be conclusive evidence of his claim to repayment with interest; but for ten days after the deposit the signature of the receiving officer is sufficient. If within that time the acknowledgment has not been received, written application must be made to the Postmaster-General, the book then becoming evidence for another ten days (s. 2). The depositor is entitled to repayment of the whole or any part of the deposit on making a demand in a prescribed form, at any post-office where deposits are received or paid, within ten days at farthest after sending in the demand (s. 3). The names of the depositors and the amount paid in or withdrawn are not to be disclosed to any one except the Postmaster-General and the officers appointed by him to carry this Act into effect (s. 4). The monies received are to be paid over to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and all sums withdrawn are to be repaid by them through the post-office (s. 5). Any deficiency in the deposit fund is to be made good out of the consolidated fund (s. 6). The rate of interest is to be 2½ per cent. on sums not less than 1*l.*, or a multiple thereof (s. 7). The interest to be calculated to December 31st in every year, and to be added to and become part of the principal (s. 8). The monies remitted to the National Debt Commissioners are to be invested in the same way as those from Savings' Banks. A separate account is to be kept, and a balance-sheet from January 1st to December 31st of each year to be laid before Parliament not later than March 31st of the following year (s. 9). Depositors wishing to transfer their deposits to a Savings' Bank will be furnished with a certificate of the whole amount due to them, and with such certificate an account is opened with the selected Savings' Bank and closed with the Post-office, or the transaction may be reversed and the depositor in a Savings' Bank may have his deposit transferred to the Post-office by a certificate signed by two trustees of the Bank (s. 10). The Postmaster-General is authorized to make regulations from time to time for the effective working of this Act, such regulations to be laid before Parliament (s. 11); as are also the accounts annually, not later than March 31st (s. 12), such accounts to be previously examined and audited by the audit commissioners (s. 13). All existing provisions relating to Savings' Banks to be deemed applicable to this Act so far as they are not repugnant (s. 14), and all expenses incurred in the execution of this Act are to be paid out of the monies received (s. 15). This Act was amended by 26 Vict. c. 14, which inter alia enacts that money standing in the name of a minor in any Savings' Bank or in a Post-office Savings' Bank, may, on the application of a parent or friend of the minor, if under the age of seven years, or upon his own application if above that age, be transferred to any other Savings' Bank, but may not be withdrawn without the consent of the Postmaster-General or two of the trustees or managers of the Savings' Bank until the minor shall have attained the age at which it might have been withdrawn under the rules of the Savings' Bank from which it shall have been transferred. Scaccarium, a chequered cloth resembling a chess-board which covered the table in the Exchequer, and on which, when certain of the King's accounts were made up, the sums were marked and scored with counters. Hence the Court of Exchequer or curia scaccarii derived its name.—3 Bl. Com. 44.

Scalam [fr. ad scalam, Lat., at the scale], the old way of paying money into the Exchequer.

Scandal, a report or rumour, or an action whereby one is affronted in public.

Scandal, in pleadings in equity, is calculated to do great and permanent injury to all persons whom it affects, by making the records of the court the means of perpetuating libellous and malignant slanders; and the court, in aid of the public morals, is bound to interfere to suppress such indecencies, which may stain the reputation and wound the feelings of the parties and their relatives and friends.

'If that which is stated,' said Lord Eldon, 'is material to the issue, it may be false, but cannot be scadalous; if relevant it is not impertinent, though scandalous in its nature; if relevant and pertinent, it cannot be treated as scandalous; and if false, it must be dealt with in another way. But if irrelevant, and especially if also scandalous, there would be much greater reason to regret that a court should not be armed with the power to protect parties from the expense, and its records from the stain which too frequently arises from the introduction of irrelevant and scandalous matter, upon affidavit, in this jnrisdiction.'—Exp. Simpson 15 Ves. 477; Smi. Ch. Pr. 786.

There was a stone of scandal raised in the great portal of the Capitol in Rome, whereon was engraven the figure of a lion, upon which bankrupts or cessionaries being seated bare-breeched, cried with a loud voice, cedo bonis (I surrender my effects); when, squatting their breech violently three times on the stone, they were acquitted. It was called the stone of scandal, because thenceforward the cessionary became intestable and incapable of giving any evidence. Julius Cæsar introduced this form of surrender, after abrogating that article of the laws of the Twelve Tables which allowed creditors to cut their insolvent debtors in pieces, and take each his member, or at least to make a slave of him.—Encyc. Lond.

Scandalum magnatum, words spoken in derogation of a peer or judge, or other great officer of the realm. They are held to be particularly heinous, and although they may be such as would not be actionable in the case of a common person, yet when spoken in disgrace of such high and respectable characters, they amount to an atrocious injury, which is redressed by an action on the case, founded on many ancient statutes, as well on behalf of the Crown, to inflict the punishment of imprisonment on the slanderer, as on behalf of the party, to recover damages for the injury sustained. But this action is now obsolete.—3 Step. Com. 632; 3 Ibid. 491 n.

Scientia utrinque par pares contrahentes facit. 3 Burr. 1910.—(Equal knowledge on both sides makes the contracting parties equal.)

Scilicet [Lat., abbrev. scil. or sc., i. e. scire licet] (that is to say, to wit).

This is not a direct and separate clause, nor a direct and entire clause, in a conveyance, but intermedia; neither is it a substantive clause of itself, but it is rather to usher in the sentence of another, and to particularise that which was too general before, or distribute that which was too gross, or to explain that which was doubtful and obscure; and it must neither increase nor diminish the premises or habendum, for it gives nothing of itself; but it may make a restriction where the precedent words are not so very express but that they may be restrained. Hob. 171.

Scintilla juris et tituli [Lat.] (a spark of law and title).

A possibility of seisin, which is supposed to exist in the grantee to uses, when all actual seisin is taken from him by the operation of the statute, upon a limitation of springing uses, and the creation of contingent ones.

To illustrate this, let us take a springing use: a grant to A. and his heirs to the use of B. and his heirs, until C. perform an act, and then to the use of C. and his heirs. Here the statute executes the use in B. which, being co-extensive with A.'s seisin, leaves no actual seisin in A. When, however, C. performs the act, B.'s use ceases, and C.'s use springs up and he enjoys the fee-simple; upon which the question arises, out of what seisin is C.'s use served? It is said to be served out of A.'s original seisin, for upon the cessor of B.'s use, it is contended that the original seisin reverted to A. for the purpose of serving C.'s use, and is a possibility of seisin or scintilla juris.

If there must be a seisin somewhere to serve the future uses when they arise, it must be either in the original grantee or feoffee to uses or the cestui que use, but the seisin of the cestui que use cannot serve any other uses, because that would be a use upon a use, which the common law repudiates. There only remains then the grantee or feoffee, who is capable of the requisite seisin, which cannot be a vested interest, but is what is known as a scintilla juris.

Again, a feoffment to A. in fee to the use of B. for life, remainder to the use of his first son unborn in tail, with remainder to the use of C. in fee. What seisin remains in A. until the birth of a son of B? A. has not an actual seisin during the suspense of the contingency, but there is a possibility of seisin reverting to him, for upon the birth of B.'s son, a seisin co-extensive with the use limited to such son, will vest in A. for the purpose of serving it.

This doctrine of scintilla juris has been warmly contested. Lord Coke admitted it (Chudleigh's case, 1 Co. p. 120 a), so did Mr. Booth (see his opinion at the end of Sheppard's Touchstone), Mr. Sanders (1 Uses and Trusts, c. 2, s. 2, p. 107, et seq.), and Mr. Burton (Comp. p. 59, 6th ed.); but Lord Bacon (On Uses, p. 47), Mr. Fearne (Cont. Rem. p. 300), Lord St. Leonards (1 Powers, c. 1, s. 3, and note 10 to Gilb. Uses, p. 296), and Mr. Preston (1 Prest. Est. p. 170, and 1 Hayes's Conv. p. 61), opposed it; and Lord St. Leonards contends that the doctrine never received a regular judicial decision; and see now 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 7.

Scire debes cum quo contrahis.—(You ought to know with whom you bargain.)

Scire facias [Lat.] (that you cause to know), a judicial writ, founded upon some record, and requiring the person against whom it is brought to show cause why the party bringing it should not have advantage of such record, or (as in the case of a scire facias to repeal letters-patent), why the record should not be annulled and vacated. It is deemed an action, and in the nature of a new original.

In the following instances this writ is considered as an original proceeding:—

(1) Scire facias to repeal letters-patent, charters, &c.

The writ is issued out of the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and is returnable there, and entered in the office called the Petty-Bag-Office; or out of the Court of Queen's Bench. When the parties proceed to issue, the clerk of the Petty-Bag delivers the record to the Queen's Bench to be tried by a jury or at bar; it is recorded in Chancery after trial and judgment and execution had thereon. If the writ is to repeal a charter, the record is transmitted to the Crown-Office of the Queen's Bench, and the cause is tried at the bar of that court.

(2) When special bail become fixed by the recognizance being forfeited, one of the modes of proceeding against them is by scire facias on the recognizance.

(3) Scire facias against the pledges in replevin and the registrar is obsolete, it being the practice to proceed upon the replevin-bond against the former, and by action on the case against the latter, for taking insufficient pledges or no pledges.

In the following instances the writ is a continuation of an original action.

(1) Upon the marriage of feme-parties.

(a) If a feme sole obtain judgment, and marry before execution, a scire facias must be brought by husband and wife, in order to have execution on the judgment; and if, after judgment awarded on this scire facias, but before execution, the wife die, the husband alone may have execution upon the judgment, without even taking out administration.

(β) If judgment be recovered against a feme sole, and she marry before execution, a scire facias must be brought against the husband and wife before the judgment can be executed; and if, after execution awarded upon this scire facias, but before execution, the wife die, the husband shall be liable to the execution.

(2) On a judgment in debt on bond.

In debt on bond or other instrument in a penal sum, conditioned for the performance of covenants, or for the doing of any other specific act, although the judgment is entered up for the entire penalty, yet execution is sued out for the amount of such damages only as the jury assess upon the breaches aforesaid suggested. The judgment, however, still remains as a security to the plaintiff for such damages as he may sustain by any further breaches; and in case of any such further breaches, the plaintiff shall have a scire facias upon the judgment against the defendant, his heirs, terre-tenants, or executors or administrators, suggesting such other breaches, and summoning him or them to show cause why execution should not be awarded upon the judgment, upon which there shall be the like proceeding as was in the action of debt upon the bond for assessing damages upon trial of issues, joined upon such breaches or inquiry thereof, upon a writ to be awarded for that purpose.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 997.

(3) On a judgment quando acciderint against an executor, &c.

If on a plea of plene administravit in an action against an executor or administrator, or on a plea of riens per descent in an action against an heir, the plaintiff instead of taking issue on the plea, take judgment of assets quando acciderint; in this case, if assets afterwards come to the hands of the executor or heir, the plaintiff must first sue out a scire facias against such executor or heir, before he can have execution. It is necessary that the writ should state that the assets came to the executor's hands after the judgment; otherwise it would be bad. If assets be found for part, the plaintiff may have judgment to recover so much immediately, and the residue of the assets in futuro.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 91.

On an abatement of a judgment by lapse of time, death of parties, &c. it is now revived by suggestion or writ of revivor.

All writs of scire facias are tested, directed, and proceeded upon, in like manner as writs of revivor.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 132; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1090. See ABATEMENT (5) and REVIVOR, WRIT OF.

In the following instance the writ is an interlocutory proceeding, and in the nature of process:

(1) Scire facias ad audiendum errores: abolished, except in case of a change of parties.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 132.

The following issue after the action is terminated:—

(1) Scire facias quare restitutionem non, for restitution after reversal in error.

(2) Scire facias ad rehabendam terram, to recover lands extended under an elegit.

(3) Scire facias against the sheriff, after returning to a fi. fa. that he has levied the debt, to compel him to pay over the money retained in his hands.

(4) When an outlaw receives the Queen's pardon, he sues out a scire facias requiring the plaintiff to appear and prosecute his action against him. The plaintiff is summoned thereon.

(5) A scire facias against the representatives of a deceased judge that they certify a bill of exceptions.

(6) Scire facias against members of a public company to obtain execution against them, upon judgment signed against their public officer, or other person sued as representing such company or body, or against such company or body itself.

A scire facias was formerly resorted to in Chancery suits, when they became abated; but this mode has been superseded in practice by the order of revivor, which see.

Scire facias for the Crown, the summary proceeding by extent is only resorted to when a Crown-debtor is insolvent, or there is good ground for supposing that the debt may be lost by delay. In ordinary cases where a debt or duty appears by record to be owing to the Crown, the process for the Crown is a writ of sci. fa. quare executionem non; but should the defendant become insolvent pending this writ, the Crown may abandon the proceeding and resort to an extent.

Scire feci, the sheriff's return on a scire facias, that he has caused notice to be given to the party against whom the writ was issued.

Scire proprie est rem ratione et per causam cognoscere.—Co. Litt. 183.—(To know properly, is to know the reason and cause of a thing.)

Scirewyte, the annual tax or prestation paid to the sheriff for holding the assizes or county courts.—Paroch. Antiq. 573.

Scite [fr. situs, Lat.], the setting or standing of any place; the seat or situation of a capital messuage, or the ground whereon it stands.

Scito, quod [ut] modus est, [si] conditio, [quia] causa.—Dyer, 138.—(Know that the word ut relates to the mode, si to the condition, quia to the reason.)

Scold [communis rixatrix, Lat.], a troublesome and angry woman who, by brawling and wrangling amongst her neighbors, breaks the public peace, increases discord, and becomes a public nuisance to the neighbourhood. See CASTIGATORY.

Sconce, a mulct or fine.

Scot and Lot [fr. sceat, Sax., part, and lot], a customary contribution laid upon all subjects according to their ability. Whoever were assessed to any contribution, though not by equal portions, were said to pay scot and lot.

Scotal, or Scotale, an extortionate practice by officers of the forest who kept ale-houses, and compelled the people to drink at their houses for fear of their displeasure. Prohibited by the Charter of the Forest, c. 7.

Scotch Peers, the sixteen lords temporal, who represent in our House of Lords the body of the Scottish nobility. They are elected for one Parliament only. See 6 Anne, c. 23, amended by 10 & 11 Vict. c. 52; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 87; and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 35.

Scotch Prisons. The law for their administration is consolidated by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 105.

Scotland, the northern portion of the island of Great Britain. It was united to England by 5 Anne, c. 8, May 1, 1707.

Scots, assessments by commissioners of sewers.

Scottare, tenants whose lands are subject to pay scot.

Scottish Universities. The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 83, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 28, provide for the better government and discipline of the Scottish Universities.

Scribere est agere.—2 Rol. Rep. 89.—(To write is to act.)

Scrip, a certificate or schedule; also evidence of the right to obtain shares in a public company, sometimes called 'scrip-certificate,' to distinguish it from the real title to shares.

Script, a writing; the original or principal document.

Scriptæ obligationes scriptis tolluntur, et nudi consensûs obligatio, contrario consensu dissolvitur.—Jur. Civ.—(Written obligations are superseded by writings, and an obligation of naked assent is dissolved by assent to the contrary.)

Scripture. All profane scoffing of the holy Scripture, or exposing any part thereof to contempt and ridicule, is punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Scrivener [fr. scrivano, Ital.; escrivain, Fr.], one who draws contracts; one whose business is to place out money at interest, receiving a bonus or commission for his trouble.

When an attorney is the general depositary of money of his clients and other persons who employ him, not simply in his character of attorney, but as a money agent, to invest their money on securities at his discretion, allowing him procuration fees for any sum laid out on bond or mortgage, as well as a fee or charge for preparing the deeds, such a course of dealing is substantially the business of scrivener.—1 Holt, 507; 3 Camp. 539.

Scroll, a mark which supplies the place of a seal.

Scroop's Inn, an obsolete law society, also called Serjeants' Place, opposite to St. Andrew's Church, Holborn, London.

Sculptures, Copyright in, provided for by 54 Geo. III. c. 56, giving fourteen years certain, with an additional fourteen years, if the proprietor be then alive, and have not assigned his property.

Scutage, a tax or contribution raised by those that held lands by knight's service, towards furnishing the king's army, at the rate of one, two, or three marks for every knight's fee.

Scutagio habendo, a writ that anciently lay against tenants by knight's service to serve in the wars, or send sufficient persons, or pay a certain sum.—F. N. B. 83.

Scute, a French gold coin of the value of 3*s.* 4*d.*

Scutella, a skuttle; anything of a flat or broad shape, like a shield.

Scutella eleemosynaria, an alms-basket.

Scutum armorum, a shield or coat of arms.

Scyldwit, a mulct for any fault.

Scyra, a fine imposed upon such as neglected to attend the scyregemot courts, which all tenants were bound to do.

Scyre-gemot, or Sciremot, a court held by the Saxons twice every year, by the bishop of the diocese and the earldorman in shires that had earldormen; and by the bishop and the sheriff where the counties were committed to the sheriff, &c. wherein both the ecclesiastical and temporal laws were given in charge to the county.—Seld. Titles Hon. 628.

Sea, the main or high seas are part of the realm of England, for thereon the courts of Admiralty have jurisdiction, but they are not subject to the common law. The main sea begins at the low water-mark, but between the high water-mark and the low water-mark, where the sea ebbs and flows, the common law and Admiralty have, divisum imperium, an alternate jurisdiction; one upon the water when it is full sea; the other upon the land when it is an ebb.

Sea-batteries, assaults by masters in the merchant service upon seamen at sea.

Sea-greens, grounds overflowed by the sea in spring-tides.

Sea-laws, laws relating to the sea, as the the Laws of Oleron, &c.

Sea-letter, or Sea-brief, a document expected to be found on board of every neutral ship. It specifies the nature and quantity of the cargo, the place whence it comes, and its destination.

Sea-marks. See BEACON.

Seal, wax or wafer with an impression.

Sealer [fr. sigillator, Lat.], an officer in Chancery who sealed the writs and instruments. The offices of sealer and deputy-sealer are abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 23.

Seal-paper, a document issued by the Lord Chancellor previously to the commencement of the sittings, detailing the business to be done for each day in his court, and in the courts of the Lords Justices and Vice Chancellors. The Master of the Rolls in like manner issues a seal-paper in respect of the business to be heard before him.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 9.

Seamen, persons engaged in navigating ships, barges, &c. upon the high seas. Those employed for this purpose upon rivers, lakes, or canals, are denominated watermen.

A British seaman must be a natural born subject, or be naturalized, or made a denizen, or have become a British subject by the conquest or cession of some newly acquired territory; or (being a foreigner) have served on board her Majesty's ships of war, in time of war, for the space of three years. But the Queen may, by proclamation, during war, declare that foreigners who have served two years in the royal navy, during such war, shall be deemed British seamen.

Various regulations have been enacted with respect to the hiring of seamen, their conduct while on board, and the payment of their wages. These regulations differ in different countries; but in all they have been intended to obviate the dispute that might otherwise arise between a master and seaman as to the terms of the contract between them, to secure due obedience to the master's orders, and to interest the seamen in the completion of the voyage, by making their earnings depend on its successful termination. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 146, et seq.

The statute law does not render a verbal agreement for wages absolutely void; but imposes a penalty on the master if a written agreement be not made. When a written agreement is made, it becomes the only evidence of the contract between the parties; and a seaman cannot recover anything agreed to be given in reward for his services, which is not specified in the articles.

A seaman who is engaged to serve on board a ship is bound to exert himself to the utmost in the service of the ship; and, therefore, a promise made by the master of a ship in distress to pay an extra sum to a seaman, as an inducement to extraordinary exertion on his part, is held to be void.

Neglect of duty, disobedience of orders, habitual drunkenness, or any cause which will justify the master in discharging a seaman, during a voyage, will also deprive the seaman of his wages. See REGISTRAR-GENERAL OF SEAMEN, and Maude and Pollock on Shipping.

Seamen's will. See 1 Williams on Executors, and NUNCUPATIVE WILL.

Séance [Fr.], session, as of some public body.

Searcher, an officer of the customs, whose business it is to examine ships outward-bound, in order to ascertain if they have any prohibited or unaccustomed goods on board, &c.

Search warrant, an authority requiring the officer to whom it is addressed to search a house or other place therein specified, for property therein alleged to have been stolen or secreted.

Sea-reeve, an officer in maritime towns and places, who takes care of the maritime rights of the lord of the manor, watches the shore, and collects the wreck.

Sea-rovers, pirates and robbers at sea.

Seashore, the space of land between high and low water-mark.

Sea-thief, a pirate.

Seaworthy, a term applied to a ship, indicating that she is, in every respect, fit for her voyage.

It is provided in all charter-parties that the vessels chartered shall be tight, staunch, and strong, well apparelled, furnished with an adequate number of mariners, sufficient tackle, provisions, &c. If the ship be insufficient in any of these particulars, the owners, though ignorant of the circumstance, will be liable for whatever damage may in consequence be done to the goods of the merchant, and if any insurance have been effected upon her, it will be void.

But whether the condition of seaworthiness be expressed in the contract or not, it is always implied.—Holt's Law of Shipping; Abbott's Treatise.

Sebastomania [fr. σεβαστός, Gk., worshipped, and μανία, frenzy], religious insanity, demonomania.

Seck, a warrant of remedy by distress.—Litt. s. 218. Also, barren or profitless. See RENT SECK.

Secondary of the Queen's Bench for registering deeds in Middlesex. See 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 30, s. 28.

Secondary, an officer who is second and next to the chief officer.—2 Lill. Abr. 506. A delegate, a deputy.

Secondary conveyances, those which presuppose some other conveyance precedent, and only serve to confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by the original conveyance. They are otherwise called derivative, and are:—(α) Releases. (β) Confirmations. (γ) Surrenders. (δ) Assignments; and (ε) Defeazances.

Secondary evidence, that species of proof which is admitted on the loss of primary evidence. There are no degrees of this evidence.

Secondary use, a use limited to take effect in derogation of a preceding estate; otherwise called a shifting use, as a conveyance to the use of A. and his heirs, with a proviso that when B. returns from India, then to the use of C. and his heirs.

Second deliverance, Writ of, a judicial writ that lies, after a nonsuit of the plaintiff in replevin, and a retorno habendo of the cattle replevied, adjudged to him that distrained them, commanding the sheriff to replevy the same cattle again, upon security given by the plaintiff in the replevin for the re-delivery of them if the distress be justified. It is a second writ of replevin, and is practically obsolete.—F. N. B. 68; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1041; 2 Selw. N. P. 1221.

Second distress. By 17 Car. II. c. 7, s. 4, in all cases where the value of the cattle distrained shall not be found to be of the full value of the arrears distrained for, the party to whom such arrears are due, his executors or administrators, may distrain again for the said arrears; but a second distress cannot, it seems, be at all justified, where there is enough which might have been taken upon the first, if the distrainer had then thought proper; for a man who has an entire duty, as rent, for example, shall not split the entire sum, and distrain for one part of it at one time, and for the other part of it at another time, and so toties quoties for several times; for that would be great oppression.

Second surcharge, Writ of. If after admeasurement of common, upon a writ of admeasurement of pasture, the same defendant surcharges the common again, the plaintiff may have this writ of second surcharge de secundâ superoneratione, which is given by the Stat. West. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 8.

Seconds, assistants at a duel.

Secretaries of State, cabinet ministers attending the sovereign, for the receipt and dispatch of letters, grants, petitions, and many of the most important affairs of the kingdom, both foreign and domestic.

There are five principal secretaries, one for the home department, another for foreign affairs, a third for the colonies, a fourth for war (26 & 27 Vict. c. 22), and a fifth for India (21 & 22 Vict. c. 106). These have under their management the most considerable affairs of the nation, and are obliged to a constant attendance on the sovereign; they receive and despatch whatever comes to their hands, be it for the Crown, the church, the army, private grants, pardons, dispensations, &c., as likewise petitions to the Crown, which, when read, are returned to the secretaries for answer; all which they despatch according to the sovereign's command and direction. Each of them has two under-secretaries, and one or more chief clerks, besides a number of other clerks and officers, wholly depending on them. The Secretaries of State are allowed power to commit persons for treason and other offences against the State in order to bring them to their trial. Some have said that this power is incident to their office, and others that they derive it in virtue of their being named in the commissions of the peace for every county in England and Wales. They have the custody of the signet, and the direction of the signet office and the paper office.

Ireland is under the direction of a chief secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, who has under him a resident under-secretary.—Encyc. Lond.

Secretary, one intrusted with the management of business; one who writes for another; an officer attached to a public establishment.

Secretary of Decrees and Injunctions, an officer of Chancery. The office was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 23.

Secta [fr. sequendo, Lat.], the witnesses or followers of a plaintiff.

Secta ad curiam, a writ that lay against him who refused to perform his suit either to the county-court or the court-baron.

Secta ad furnum, suit to a public oven or bake-house. Abolished.

Secta ad justiciam faciendam, a service which a man is bound to perform by his fee.—Bract.

Secta ad molendinum, a writ that lay where a man, by usage, had ground his corn at the mill of a certain person, and afterwards went to another mill with his corn, thereby withdrawing his suit to the former.—F. N. B. 123. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Secta ad torrale, suit to a kiln or malt-house. Abolished.

Secta curiæ, suit and service done by tenants at the lord's court.

Secta est pugna civilis : sicut actores, armantur actionibus, et quasi gladiis accinguntur, ita rei muniuntur exceptionibus et defenduntur quasi clypeis.—Hob. 20.—(A suit is a civil warfare; for as the plaintiffs are armed with actions, and as it were girded with swords, so the defendants are fortified with pleas, and are defended as it were by shields.)

Sectâ faciendâ per illam quæ habet eniciam partem, a writ to compel the heir, who has the elder's part of the co-heirs, to perform suit and service for all the coparceners.

Secta non faciendis, a writ for a woman, who, for her dower, ought not to perform suit of court.

Secta quæ scripto nititur à scripto variari non debet.—Jenk. Cent. 65.—(A suit which relies upon a writing, ought not to vary from the writing.)

Secta regalis, a suit or service by which all persons were bound twice in a year to attend the sheriff's tourn.

Sectâ unicâ tantum faciendâ pro pluribus hæreditatibus, a writ for an heir who was distrained by the lord to do more suits than one, that he should be allowed to do one suit only in respect of the land of divers heirs descended to him.

Sectatores, suitors of court who, amongst the Saxons, gave their judgment or verdict in civil suits upon the matter of fact and law.—1 Reeves's Hist. Eng. Law, 22.

Sectores, bidders at an auction.—Civil Law.

Secular, not spiritual; relating to affairs of the present world (in seculo).

Secular clergy, parochial clergy who perform their ministry in the world.—3 Step. Com. 24 n.

Secundâ superoneratione pasturæ. See SECOND SURCHARGE, Writ of.

Secundum statutum. See APPEARANCE SEC. STAT.

Securitatem inveniendi, &c., an ancient writ, lying for the sovereign, against any of his subjects, to stay them from going out of the kingdom to foreign parts; the ground whereof is, that every man is bound to serve and defend the commonwealth as the Crown shall think fit. F. N. B. 115.

Securitatis pacis, a writ that lay for one who was threatened with death or bodily harm by another, against him who so threatened.—Reg. Orig. 88.

Security for costs. At common law, if a plaintiff, whether suing in an individual or a representative capacity, and whether for his own benefit or that of another, reside abroad, or even in Ireland or Scotland, the court or a judge, upon application, will stay the proceedings until he give security for costs, and this although the defendant have no defence on the merits. If a second action of ejectment for the same premises be brought, proceedings will be staid until security be given (C. L. A. P. 1854, s. 93).

A defendant will not be compelled to give this security, unless, perhaps, in replevin, in which action he is deemed a plaintiff. If a plaintiff be convicted of felony, and under sentence of transportation, proceedings will be stayed until security be given. Where another person is proceeding with an action in the name of the party on the record, and that party is insolvent, the court will, by staying proceedings, compel him for whose benefit the action is proceeding, to come in and give security for costs. But if one of several plaintiffs reside in this country, security will not generally be given. If the plaintiff, however, be out of the kingdom on a mere temporary absence, especially if he be a seaman or foreigner serving on board an English vessel, or on board a foreign vessel, constantly sailing to and from this country, he will not be compelled to give this security, unless where his absence commenced before action brought; but the absence must be temporary. And it is no ground to obtain this security that the plaintiff is about to leave the country, or is a foreigner, unless he reside abroad. It will not be granted when the absence is not voluntary, as in the case of naval and military officers and other persons engaged abroad in the public service.

If, after the security given, one or both of the sureties become bankrupt or insolvent, that is no ground for fresh security.

The defendant should apply to the plaintiff's attorney or agent for security, and on refusal, give two days' notice of application, which must be made before issue joined. The amount and sufficiency of the security is decided by one of the masters. The court will not order the bond to be cancelled on an affidavit that the plaintiff has returned to England, and is resident here.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac by Pren. 1349.

In Chancery, security for costs can be obtained under similar circumstances. If it appear by the bill that the plaintiff is abroad, the application is either by motion or petition, as of course; but otherwise, it must be made upon notice of motion, supported by an affidavit of the facts. The application should be made as soon as the defendant is aware of the plaintiff's absence; for should he take another step in the suit, after knowing it, he waives all right to security. A bond is given to a clerk of records and writs in the penal sum of 100*l.*—Smi. Ch. Pr. 772.

Security for keeping the peace. See KEEPING THE PEACE.

Security of the Crown. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 12.

Securius expediuntur negotia commissa pluribus: et plus vident oculi quam oculus.—4 Co. 46.—(Business entrusted to many speeds best; and many eyes see more than one eye.)

Secus [Lat.] (otherwise).

Se defendendo, homicide, excusable manslaying in defence of one's own life, when attacked and put in jeopardy.

Sederunt, Acts of, ordinances of the Court of Session in Scotland, under authority of the Statute 1540, c. 93, by which authority is given to the court to make such regulations as may be necessary for the ordering of processes and the expediting of justice.

Sedition, an offence against the Crown and government, not capital, and not amounting to treason. All contempts against the sovereign and the government, and riotous assemblies for political purposes, may be ranked under the head of sedition.

In the Scotch law, an attempt made by meeting, or by speeches or publications, to disturb the tranquillity of the state is distinguished from leasing-making, which has in view to diminish or affect the sovereign's private character.

Seditious libel. See 60 Geo. III. and 1 Geo. IV. c. 8.

Seducing to desert, or desertion, from the army or navy, an offence against the government, provided against by the Annual Mutiny Acts and Marine Acts. See 1 Geo. I. c. 47; 37 Geo. III. c. 70; and 1 Vict. c. 91.

Seducing to leave service, an injury for which a master may have an action on the case.

Seduction, the corruption of women.

An action of seduction is frequently brought by a parent for the purpose of obtaining a compensation, in damages, for the debauching of his daughter, and getting her with child; per quod servitium amisit. A master also, not standing in the relation of a parent, may maintain this action for debauching his servant. In ascertaining the amount of damages, a jury should regard not merely the injury sustained by the loss of service, but also the wounded feeling of the parent or person standing in loco parentis. Our criminal code has not provided any punishment for this offence.

See [fr. sedes, Lat.], the dignity of a bishop.

Seignior, or Seigneur, a lord of a fee or manor.

Seignior in gross, a lord without a manor, simply enjoying superiority and services.

Seigniorage, a royalty or prerogative of the Crown, whereby an allowance of gold and silver, brought in the mass to be exchanged for coin, is claimed.

Seigniory, a manor or lordship.

Seisin, possession.

There is a seisin in deed, as when an actual possession is taken; or in law, where lands descend, and one has not actually entered upon them.

Seisin, Livery of, delivery of possession, called by the Feudists investiture.

Seisina facit stipitem.—Wright's Ten. 185.—(Seisin makes the heir.) Exploded by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106.

Seisinâ habendâ, &c. a writ for delivery of seisin to the lord, of lands and tenements, after the sovereign, in right of his prerogative, had had the year, day, and waste, on a felony committed, &c.—Reg. Orig. 165.

Seisin-ox, a perquisite formerly due to the Sheriff of Scotland when he gave infeftment to an heir holding Crown-lands. It is now converted into a money-payment, proportioned to the value of the estate.

Seizing of heriots, taking the best beast, &c. where an heriot is due, on the death of the tenant. It is a species of self-remedy, not much unlike that of taking goods or cattle in distress; but, in the latter case, they are seized as a pledge, in the former, as the property of the person for whom seized.

Seizure of goods for offences. No goods of a felon or other offender can be taken to the use of the Crown before they are forfeited. There are two kinds of seizure: (1) verbal, to take an inventory, and charge the town or place where the owner is indicted for the offence; and (2) actual, which is taking them away after conviction.—3 Inst. 103.

Sel, denotes the bigness of a thing to which it is added, as Selwood, a big wood.

Selda [fr. selde, Sax., a seat], a shop, shed, or stall in a market; a wood of sallows or willows; also a saw-pit.—Co. Litt. 4.

Select Vestry Act, called also Sturges Bourne's Act, 59 Geo. III. c. 12.

Selecti judices, Roman judges returned by the prætor, drawn by lot, and subject to be challenged and sworn like our juries.—3 Bl. Com. 366.

Self-defence. Both the life and limbs of a man are of such high value, in the estimation of the law of England, that it pardons even homicide, if committed se defendendo, or in order to preserve them. See DEFENCE, HOMICIDE.

Self-homicide, the killing of one's self; suicide.

Self-murder, or Self-slaughter. See FELO DE SE.

Selion of land, a ridge of ground rising between two furrows, containing no certain quantity, but sometimes more and sometimes less.—Termes de la Ley.

Seller, a vendor, one who disposes of chattels for money.

Selling public offices, an offence against the government.

It is provided by 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16, confirmed and extended by 49 Geo. III. c. 126, that persons buying or selling, or receiving or paying money or reward for any office in the gift of the Crown (with certain exceptions), and persons receiving or paying money for, or soliciting or obtaining any such office, or making any negotiation or pretended negotiation relating thereto, and persons opening or advertising houses for transacting business relating to the sale of any such office, shall respectively be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.—6 Geo. IV. cc. 82, 83, 105.

Selling a wife. It is a popular error that a husband can get rid of his wife by selling her in the open market-place with a halter round her neck.

Semble [abbrev. semb. or sem., Fr.] (it seems).

Semel malus semper præsumitur esse malus in eodem genere.—Cro. Car. 317.—(Whoever is once guilty, is always presumed to be guilty in the same kind.)

Semestria, the collected decisions of the emperors in their councils.—Civ. Law.

Seminaufragium, half-shipwreck, as casting goods overboard in a storm; also, where a ship has been so much damaged that her repair costs more than her worth.

Semi-plena probatio, a semi-proof; the testimony of one person, upon which the civilians will not allow any sentence to be founded.

Semper ita fiat relatio ut valeat dispositio.—6 Co. 76.—(Let the reference always be so made, that the disposition may avail.)

Semper paratus [Lat.] (always ready).

Semper præsumitur pro legitimatione puerorum; et filiatio non potest probari.—Co. Litt. 126 a.—(The presumption is always in favor of the legitimacy of children, and filiation cannot be proved.)

Semper præsumitur pro sententiâ.—3 Buls. 42.—(Presumption is always for the sentence.)

Sen, justice.—Co. Litt. 61 a.

Senage, money paid for synodals.

Senator, a Member of Parliament.

The judges of the Court of Sessions in Scotland are entitled Senators of the College of Justice.—Act, 1540, c. 93.

Senatores sunt partes corporis regis.—4 Inst. 53.—(The senators are part of the king's body.)

Senatus consulta (ordinances of the senate), public acts, among the Romans, which regarded the whole community.—Sand. Just. 90.

Senatus decreta (decisions of the senate), private acts, which concerned particular persons or personal matters.—Civ. Law.

Seneschal [sein, Germ., a house, and schale, an office], a steward; also, one who has the dispensing of justice.—Co. Litt. 61 a; Kitch. 13.

Seneschallo et mareshallo quod non teneat placita de libero tenemento, a writ addressed to the steward and marshal of England, inhibiting them to take cognizance of an action in their court that concerns freehold.—Reg. Orig. 185. Abolished.

Seneucia, widowhood.

Seney-days, play-days, or times of pleasure and diversion.

Senior [Lat.] (the elder).

Sensus verborum est anima legis.—5 Co. 2.—(The meaning of the words is the spirit of the law.)

Sensus verborum ex causâ dicendi accipiendus est: et sermones semper accipiendi sunt secundum subjectam materiam.—4 Co. 14.—(The sense of words is to be taken according as the words are used; and discourses are always to be interpreted according to the subject-matter.)

Sensus verborum est duplex, mitis et asper, et verba semper acoipienda sunt in mitiore sensu.—4 Co. 13.—(The meaning of words is twofold, mild and harsh; and words are to be received in their milder sense.)

Sentence of a court, a definitive judgment pronounced in a cause or criminal proceeding.

Sentence of death recorded. This being entered on the record, has the same effect as if it had been pronounced, and the offender reprieved.

Sententia contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatam.—7 Co. 43.—(A sentence against marriage never becomes a matter finally adjudged.)

Sententia facit jus, et legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet.—Ellesm. Postn. 55.—(Judgment creates the right, and the interpretation of the law has the force of law.)

Sententia facit jus, et res judicata pro veritate accipitur.—Ellesm. Postn. 55.—(Judgment creates the right, and what is adjudicated is taken for truth.)

Sententia interlocutoria revocari potest, definitiva non potest.—Bacon.— (An interlocutory judgment may be recalled, but not a final.)

Sententia non fertur de rebus non liquidis: et oportet quod certa res deducatur in judicium.—Jenk. Cent. 7.—(Judgment is not given on things not liquidated: and something certain ought to be brought to judgment.)

Separaliter [Lat.] (separately or distributively).

Separate estate. The common law does not allow a married woman to possess any property independently of her husband, but when property is settled to her separate use and benefit, equity treats her, in respect to that property, as a feme sole, or unmarried woman. A wife's separate property may be acquired by a pre-nuptial contract with her husband, or by gift, either from the husband, or from any other person.

A power is frequently given to the wife to dispose of her own or her husband's real or personal property notwithstanding her coverture. This power is sometimes a general one, unrestrained, both as to the mode of exercising it, and as to the objects in whose favor it is to be exercised. At other times, a special power only is given, being restrained, either as to the contemplated beneficiaries of the power, or as to the mode or form in which it shall be exercised, and sometimes as to both.

With regard to personalty, whether in possession or expectancy, a mere limitation of it to her separate use will enable her in equity to dispose of it to the full extent of her interest, either by deed or will, unless she be restrained from doing so by the instrument giving it to her.

As to the rents and profits of realty, a gift of them to, or in trust for, the wife, to her separate use, enables her to dispose of them also as a feme sole. But a limitation of realty to her in fee for her sole and separate use, without expressing more, will not enable her to dispose of it during the marriage, otherwise than under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, because, no power of disposition having been given to her, she can only dispose of it by the mode prescribed by the general law; and if she omit to do so, her heir will take the estate. And she cannot make a will of such realty.

In order to assure to the wife a full protection against marital influence, she herself should be incapacitated from affecting her interest, or even anticipating it.

Lord Langdale, the late Master of the Rolls, thus stated (Tullet v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 1) the summary of this doctrine: 'It appears to me, as the result of the authorities, and of the constant practice of conveyancers, which great and eminent judges have considered to be no mean evidence of the law:—

(1) 'That property (whether real or personal) given to a woman for her separate use, independent of any husband, may, under the authority of this court, be enjoyed by her during her coverture, as her separate estate, although the property originally, or at any subsequent period, became vested in her when discovert.

(2) 'That, in respect of such separate estate, she is, by this court, considered as a feme sole, although covert. Her faculties as such, and the nature and extent of them, are to be collected from the terms in which the gift is made to her, and will be supported by this court for her protection.

(3) 'The words "independent of a husband," whether expressed or implied in the terms of the gift, mean no more than that this court will not permit the marital power of the husband to be used in contravention of the enjoyment of the property according to the terms of the gift.

(4) 'If the gift be made for her sole and separate use, without more, she has, during the coverture, an alienable estate independent of her husband.

(5) 'If the gift be made for her sole and separate use, without power to alienate, she has, during coverture, the present enjoyment of an unalienable estate, independent of her husband.

(6) 'In either case she has, when discovert, a power of alienation; the restraint is annexed to the separate estate only, and the separate estate has its existence only during coverture; whilst the woman is discovert, the separate estate, whether modified by restraint or not, is suspended, and has no operation, though it is capable of arising upon the happening of a marriage.

'The restriction cannot be considered distinctly from the separate estate, of which it is only a modification; to say that the restriction exists, is saying no more than that the separate estate is so modified; the donor in giving the woman, when married, some of the faculties of a feme sole, has withheld the power of alienation; under the terms of the gift, and by the aid of equity, the woman is a feme sole as to the present enjoyment of the property, but no further; measuring her faculty by the terms of the gift, she is not a feme sole as to the disposition of her property in anticipation of her intended provision. If there be no separate estate, there can be no such restriction as that which is now under consideration. The separate estate may, and often does, exist without the restriction, but the restriction has no independent existence; when found, it is a modification of the separate estate, and inseparable from it.'

Separate maintenance. If a husband and wife cannot agree so as to carry out the great purpose of their union—mutual love and respect, the contributing to the happiness of one another, and their solemn duty to their children, they should resolve to live apart. A deed of separation, containing the terms and reciprocal conditions upon which an actual and immediate separation is to be arranged and governed, will be valid, so far as relates to the trusts and covenants of the husband, and his indemnity by the trustees for the wife; but if it only contemplate a contingent or future separation, it will be void, as obviously opposed to the policy of marriage, and the sound well-being of the community.

The trustees usually covenant with the husband, to indemnify him against any debts which the wife may incur during the separation, whereupon the husband covenants to provide a given maintenance for the wife, which will secure the deed from being upset by his creditors or subsequent purchasers for value, the trustees' indemnity being a valuable and binding consideration validating the settlement. The absence of this indemnity would render the deed void as against creditors and subsequent purchasers; unless the consideration be the relinquishment by the wife of her alimony, or the compromise of a suit by the wife, either of which would be valuable and binding.

A mere agreement for a separation will not be specifically enforced in equity, by a decree establishing it personally, whether the covenants be or be not binding on the husband and trustees; for the effect of the decree would be to make them binding on the wife, and to permit married people to effect, at their pleasure, a partial dissolution of their solemn contract.

If, after the separation, the husband and wife be reconciled, and live together again, that circumstance will avoid and put an end to the deed or agreement, and, consequently, determine the separate allowance; for by cohabiting, the maintenance, which was merely accessory to the separation, must expire with it.

Separation, the cessation of conjugal cohabitation of man and wife.

Separation of benefices, &c. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104.

Separatists, seceders from the church. They, like Quakers, solemnly affirm, instead of taking the usual oath, before they give evidence. See QUAKERS for the statutes.

Separia, several or severed and divided from other ground.—Paroch. Antiq. 336.

Sepoy, or Sipoy [fr. sip. Hind., a bow and arrow], an Indian native soldier.

Septennial elections. Our parliament must expire or die a natural death at the end of every seventh year, if not previously dissolved by the royal prerogative.—1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 38.

Septuagesima, the third Sunday before Quadragesima Sunday in Lent, being about the 70th day before Easter.

Septum, an enclosure; any place paled in.

Sepultura, an offering to the priest, for the burial of a dead body.

Sequamur vestigia patrum nostrorum.—Jenk. Cent.—(Let us follow the footsteps of our fathers.)

Sequatur sub suo periculo, a writ that lay against one where a summons ad warrantizandum was awarded against one, and the sheriff returned that he had nothing whereby he might be summoned; then issued an alias and a pluries, and if he came not in on the pluries, this writ issued.—O. N. B. 163.

Sequela causæ, the process and depending issue of a cause for trial.

Sequela curiæ, suit of court.

Sequela molendina. See SECTA AD MOLENDINUM.

Sequela villanorum, the family retinue and appurtenances to the goods and chattels of villeins, which were at the absolute disposal of the lord.—Paroch. Antiq. 216.

Sequels, small allowances of meal, or manufactured victual made to the servants at a mill where corn was ground, by tenure in Scotland, for their work. See THIRLAGE.

Sequendum et prosequendum, to follow and prosecute a cause.

Sequester, to renounce; to set aside from the use of the owners to that of others.

Sequestrari facias, Writ of, a process of execution issued against a beneficed clerk, commanding the bishop to enter into the rectory and parish church, and to take and sequester the same, and hold them until, of the rents, tithes, and profits thereof, and of the other ecclesiastical goods of the defendant, he have levied the plaintiff's debt. It is in the nature of a levari facias.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1273.

Sequestrari facias de bonis ecclesiasticis, a writ issued out of Chancery, and directed to the bishop of the diocese in which the rectory or vicarage of a beneficed clerk is situate, commanding him to enter into the benefice and sequester, and hold the same until he shall of the rents, tithes, &c., and other ecclesiastical goods belonging to the said rectory or vicarage, have levied a sum of money which the beneficed clerk has been ordered by the court to pay. Before this writ can be issued, it is necessary that the person to whom such money has been ordered to be paid should have sued out a writ of fieri facias or of elegit, and that the sheriff should have returned that the person against whom such writ issued is a beneficed clerk, and has no goods or chattels in his bailiwick, and that immediately after such return the said writ with such return shall have been filed as of record.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xxix., r. 11.

Sequestratio, the separating or setting aside of a thing in controversy, from the possession of both the parties that contend for it; it is twofold, voluntary, done by consent of all parties, and necessary, when a judge orders it.—Civ. Law.

Sequestration in Chancery, a prerogative process addressed to certain commissioners, empowering them to enter upon the real estates, and sequester the rents thereof, as also upon the goods, chattels, and personal estate of a person in contempt for disobedience of a decree or order, and keep the same until the defendant shall clear his contempt. It has no return, and is granted as of course upon a return of non est inventus by the serjeant-at-arms, or by a sheriff on an attachment.—Consol. Ord. 1860, xxix., r. 3; 1 Eq. Rep. 261.

As against peers, members of Parliament, and corporations, the sequestration is nisi only in the first instance.

The sequestrators are officers of the court, and as such are amenable thereto, and are to act from time to time in the execution of their office as the court shall direct; they are to account for what comes to their hands, and are to bring the money into court as ordered, to be put out at interest or otherwise, as shall be found necessary; this money is not usually paid to the plaintiff, but remains in court until the defendant has appeared or answered and cleared his contempt, and then whatever has been seized shall be accounted for and paid over to him; the court, however, having the whole under their power, may do therein as they please, and as shall be most agreeable to the justice and equity of the case.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 121.

Sequestration of a benefice. See SEQUESTRARI FACIAS.

Sequestro habendo, a judicial writ for the discharging a sequestration of the profits of a church benefice, granted by the bishop at the sovereign's command, thereby to compel the parson to appear at the suit of another; upon his appearance, the parson may have this writ for the release of the sequestration.—Reg. Judic. 36.

Sequi debet potentia justitiam non præcedere. 2 Inst. 454.—(Power should follow justice, not precede it.)

Serf, the slave of feudalism.

Seriatim [Lat.] (severally).

Serjeant, or Serjeants [fr. serviens, Lat.], used in several senses:—

(1) Serjeants-at-law, or of the coif (servientes ad legem), otherwise called serjeants counter, the highest degree in the common law, as doctors in the civil law; but, according to Spelman, a doctor of law is superior to a serjeant, for the very name of a doctor is magisterial, but that of a serjeant is only ministerial. Serjeants-at-law are made by the Queen's writ, addressed unto such as are called, commanding them to take upon them that degree by a certain day.—Fortescue, c. 50; 3 Cro. I.; Dyer, 72; 2 Inst. 213. See PRECEDENCE.

The monopoly enjoyed by the serjeants in the Court of Common Pleas, during term time, has been abolished, and the court thrown open to the bar generally.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 54. See PREAUDIENCE.

(2) Serjeants-at-arms, officers attending the sovereign's person to arrest individuals of distinction offending, and give attendance on the Lord High Steward of England, sitting in judgment on any traitor, &c. Two of these, by the royal permission, attend on the two Houses of Parliament, and each has a deputy; the office of him in the House of Commons is the keeping of the doors, and the execution of such commands, touching the apprehension and taking into custody of any offender, as that House shall enjoin him. Another of them attends in the Court of Chancery, and one on the Lord Treasurer of England; also, one upon the Lord Mayor of London on extraordinary solemnities, &c. They are in the old books called virgatories, because they carried silver rods gilded, as they now do maces, before the sovereign.—Fleta, l. 2, c. xxxviii.

(3) Serjeants of the household are officers who execute several functions within the royal household.—33 Hen. VIII. c. 12.

(4) The common serjeant, a judicial officer in the city of London, who attends the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen on court days, and is in council with them on all occasions within or without the precincts or liberties of the city.

(5) Inferior serjeants, such as serjeants of the mace in corporations, officers of the county; and there are serjeants of manors, of the police, &c.

Serjeantia idem est quod servitium.—Co. Litt. 105.—(Serjeanty is the same as service.)

Serjeants' Inn, called formerly Faryndon Inn, Chancery Lane, a law-society. There is one in Fleet Street, but it is not a law-society.

Serjeanty, or Sergeanty, or Seargeanty, a service anciently due to the Crown for lands held of it, and which could not be due to any other lord. It was divided into grand and petit. See TENURE.

Sermo index animi.—5 Co. 118.—(Speech is an index of the mind.)

Sermo relatus ad personam intelligi debet de conditione personæ.—4 Co. 16.—(A speech relating to the person is to be understood as relating to his condition.)

Sermones semper accipiendi sunt secundum subjectam materiam, et conditionem personarum. 4 Co. 14.—(Discourses are to be understood according to their subject-matter, and the condition of the persons.)

Servage, when a tenant, besides payment of a certain rent, finds one or more workmen for his lord's service. King John brought the Crown of England in servage to the see of Rome.—2 Inst. 174; 1 Ric. II. c. 6.

Servants. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

Servi, bondmen or servile tenants.

They were of four sorts: (1) Such as sold themselves for a livelihood. (2) Debtors sold because they were unable to pay their debts. (3) Captives in war, retained and employed as perfect slaves. (4) Nativi, born servants, as such, solely belonged to the lord. There were also said to be servi testimentales, those which were afterwards called covenant-servants.—Cowel.

Servi redemptione [Lat.], criminal slaves in the time of Hen. I.—1 Kemble's Saxons, 197 (1849).

Service [fr. servitium, Lat.], that duty which a tenant, by reason of his estate, owes to his lord. There are many divisions of this duty in our ancient law books, as into personal and real, which is either urbane or rustic, free and base, continual or annual, casual and accidental, intrinsic and extrinsic, certain and uncertain, &c. See TENURE. Also, the formal mode of bringing a writ or other process, or a notice in a suit, to the knowledge of the person affected by it.

Service in the Army. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 4, having enacted that for three years after its passing any person might be enlisted to serve her Majesty as a soldier for any term not exceeding ten years in the infantry, or twelve years in the cavalry or artillery, or other ordnance corps, as might be authorized by any order or orders of her Majesty in council in that behalf; the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 55, continues such Act in force 'as if six years after the passing of the said Act had been mentioned therein, instead of three years, and shall be deemed and taken to have had effect accordingly, to all intents and purposes, as if this Act had actually passed before the expiration of the said term of three years.'

Service of an heir. By the law of Scotland, before an heir can regularly acquire a right to the ancestor's estate, he ought to be served heir, which is one of the old forms of the law of Scotland, proceeding upon a writ, and including in it the decision of a jury, fixing the right and character of the heir to the estate of the ancestor.

Service secular, worldly service, as contrasted with spiritual or ecclesiastical.

Servientibus, certain writs touching servants and their masters violating the statutes made against their abuses.—Reg. Orig. 189.

Servient tenement, an estate in respect of which a service is owing, as the dominant tenement is that to which the service is due.

Servile est expilationis crimen; sola innocentia libera.—2 Inst. 573.—(The crime of theft is slavish; innocence alone is free.)

Serving foreign states, an offence against the government, as being a breach of a subject's allegiance.—3 Jac. I. c. 4, s. 18; 59 Geo. III. c. 69.

Servitia personalia sequuntur personam.—2 Inst. 374.—(Personal services follow the person.)

Servitium feodale et prædiale, a personal service, but due only by reason of lands which were held in fee.—Bract. l. 2, c. xvi.

Servitium forinsecum, a service which did not belong to the chief lord, but to the king.—Mon. Ang. ii. 48.

Servitium, in lege Angliæ, regulariter accipitur pro servitio quod per tenentes dominis suis debetur ratione feodi sui.—Co. Litt. 65.—(Service, by the law of England, means the service which is due from the tenants to the lords, by reason of their fees.)

Servitium intrinsecum, that service which was due to the chief lord alone from his tenants within his manor.—Fleta, l. 3.

Servitium liberum, a service to be done by feudatory tenants, who were called liberi homines, and distinguished from vassals, as was their service; for they were not bound to any of the base services of ploughing the lord's land, &c. but were to find a man and horse, or go with the lord into the army, or to attend his court, &c. It was called also servitium liberum armorum.

Servitium regale, royal service, or the prerogatives that, within a royal manor, belonged to the lord of it; which were generally reckoned to be the following—viz. power of judicature in matters of property, and of life and death in felonies and murders; right to waifs and estrays; minting of money; assize of bread and beer, and weights and measures.—Paroch. Antiq. 60.

Servi testimentales, covenant-servants

Servitiis acquietandis, a judicial writ for a man distrained for services to one, when he owes and performs them to another, for the acquittal of such services.—Reg. Judic. 27.

Servitor, a serving man; particularly applied to students at Oxford, upon the foundation, who are similar to sizars at Cambridge.

Servitors of bills, servants or messengers of the marshal of the Queen's Bench, who were sent abroad with writs, &c. to summon persons to that court.—2 Hen. IV. c. 23.

Servitudes, burdens affecting property and rights in Scotland; nearly resembling easements in England.

In the civil law certain portions or fragments of the right of ownership separated from the rest, and enjoyed by persons other than the owner of the thing itself. As to its various kinds, see Sand. Just. 206.

Servitus est constitutio jure gentium, quâ quis domino alieno contra naturam subjicitur.—Co. Litt. 116.—(Slavery is an institution by the law of nations, by which a man is subjected to a foreign master, contrary to nature.)

Sess, or Assess, rate, tax.

Session, Court of, in Scotland, the supreme civil court of Scotland, instituted A.D. 1532, and formerly consisting of fifteen judges—that number being reduced, in 1830, by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 69, s. 20, to thirteen; viz. the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and eleven ordinary lords. This court is required, by 48 Geo. III. c. 151, to sit in two divisions; the Lord President, with three ordinary lords, form the first division; and the Lord Justice-Clerk and three other ordinary lords, form the second division. There are five permanent Lords Ordinary, not attached exclusively to either division, but equally to both, the last appointed of whom officiates in the bills, i. e. petitions to the court during session, and performs the other duties of junior Lord Ordinary; the four other lords performing, in weekly rotation, the duties of ordinary in the Outer House. The chambers of the Parliament House, in which the first and second divisions of the Court of Session hold their sittings, are called the Inner House: that in which the Lords Ordinary sit, as single judges, to hear motions and causes, is called the Outer House, which is the great hall of the Parliament House. The nomination and appointment of the judges is in the Crown. No one can be appointed who has not served as an advocate or principal clerk of session for five years, or a writer to the signet for ten years.—See JUSTICIARY, High Court of.

Session, Great, of Wales, a court which was abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 70; the proceedings now issue out of the courts at Westminster, and two of the judges of the superior courts hold the circuits in Wales and Cheshire, as in other English counties.

Session of Parliament, the sittings of the Houses of Lords and Commons, which are continued, day by day, by adjournment, until the parliament is prorogued or dissolved.

Sessional divisions of counties. See 9 Geo. IV. c. 43; 10 Geo. IV. c. 46; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 12; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 65.

Sessions, a sitting or general congregation of justices of the county in court upon their commission, as the sessions of oyer and terminer, gaol-delivery, &c.

Sessions of the Peace, sittings of justices of the peace for the execution of those powers which are confided to them by their commission, or by charter, and by numerous statutes. They are of four descriptions:—

I. Petty Sessions.

Every meeting of two or more justices in the same place, for the execution of some power vested in them by law, whether had on their own mere motion, or on the requisition of any party entitled to require their attendance in discharge of some duty, is a petty or petit session. The occasions for holding petty sessions are very numerous; among the most important of which is the bailing persons accused of felony, which may be done after a full hearing of evidence on both sides, where the presumption of guilt shall either be weak in itself, or weakened by the proofs adduced on behalf of the prisoner.

As to the right of the public to attend petty sessions, it is settled, that in cases of preliminary inquiry, as where magistrates sit to determine whether they shall bail or commit a party accused of felony or misdemeanor, no person, as one of the public, can claim, as of right, to be present. The 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 114, allowing counsel to address the jury for prisoners at their trial, does not alter the law in this respect. But when magistrates sit to adjudicate as upon a proceeding for a penalty, the place in which they sit is an open court of justice, to which all persons have a right of access, and from which no one may be lawfully removed, so long as he conducts himself with propriety.

II. Special Sessions.

A special session is a sitting of two or more justices, holden, not of their own mere motion and private agreement, but on a particular occasion for the execution of some given branch of their authority, after reasonable notice to all the other magistrates of the hundred or other division of the county, city, &c. for which it is convened and holden, has been served personally or by post, subject to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 33.

There are several special sessions required by law to be holden at particular periods; as for appointing overseers of the poor, by 43 Eliz. c. 2, and 54 Geo. III. c. 91, on the 25th March, or within fourteen days after; and for licensing ale-houses and victualling-houses, to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed on the premises, on some day between 20th August and 14th September inclusive, except in Surrey and Middlesex, where the meetings must be held within the first ten days of March; and for appointing the days of holding not less than eight, nor more than twelve, special sessions in the year, for executing the purposes of the Highway Act, which, by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50, s. 45, are to be so appointed at a special sessions to be held within fourteen days after every 20th March. Also, justices acting in every petty sessions division shall, four times at least in every year, hold a special sessions to hear appeals against poor-rates, giving at least twenty-eight days' notice before the holding of the same, in pursuance of 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 96, s. 6, and by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, for increasing security of persons and property, the justices of peace of every county in England shall, on some day after 24th March and before 9th April, in each year, hold a special petty session of the peace in their several divisions, for the appointment of parochial constables; of which session due notice shall be given to every justice usually acting in that division.

III. General Sessions.

A general sessions of the peace is a court of record holden before two or more justices, whereof one is of the quorum, for execution of the general authority given to justices by the commission of the peace and certain Acts of Parliament. The only description of general sessions which is now usually holden is the court of General Quarter Sessions; but in the county of Middlesex, besides the four quarter sessions, four general sessions are held in the intervals, and original intermediate sessions occasionally take place. A general session may be called by any two justices within the jurisdiction, one being of the quorum, or by the custos rotulorum, and one justice; but not by one justice, or by the custos rotulorum alone. The presence of two justices is necessary to its being held or even adjourned so as to hold it legally at another time.

IV. General Quarter Sessions.

They are that species of general sessions which is held under authority of the commission of the peace by two or more justices (one being of the quorum), at some place within the county, fixed by their precept, once in every quarter of the year, as directed by various statutes. It is a court of oyer and terminer, and a court of record, and not a court of inferior jurisdiction. By 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 25, it was enacted, 'that in the year of our Lord 1831, and afterwards, the justices of the peace in every county, riding, or division, for which general quarter sessions of the peace by law ought to be held, shall hold their general quarter sessions of the peace in the first week after the 11th day of October; in the first week after the 28th day of December; in the first week after the 31st day of March; and in the first week after the 24th day of June; and that all acts, matters, and things done, performed, and transacted at the times appointed by this Act for the holding of the general quarter sessions of the peace, shall be as valid and binding to all intents and purposes as if the same had been done, performed, and transacted at general quarter sessions of the peace, holden at the times by law limited for the holding thereof before the passing of this Act.' This statute is merely directory, for quarter sessions of the peace would be good though held at other times than those specified. But because in some counties of England and Wales, the time usually fixed for holding the spring assizes interferes with the due holding of the sessions, appointed to be holden in the first week after the 31st of March, the 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 47, enacts that in every county, riding, or division, it shall be lawful for the justices assembled in their general quarter sessions, in the week next after the 28th day of December, in every year, to name, if they shall see occasion so to do, two justices of the peace, who shall be empowered, as soon as may be after the time for holding the spring assizes shall be appointed, to fix the day for holding the next general quarter sessions of the peace for such county, &c. so as such time may not be earlier than the 7th March, nor later than 22nd April; and to give notice of the day so fixed by advertisement in such newspaper as shall be directed by the justices so assembled; and in every such case the general quarter sessions, held on the day so fixed and notified, shall be valid, and it shall not be necessary to hold any sessions of the peace for such county, &c. in the next week after the 31st day of March, anything in 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, to the contrary notwithstanding. Provided, that in every county, where no other day shall be fixed under this Act, the justices shall hold their general quarter sessions of the peace in the week next after the 31st March, as required by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70.

The time for holding quarter sessions in boroughs is provided for by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76.

There are held in London and Middlesex at least eight sessions in every year, four of them held as quarter sessions, at periods as nearly corresponding to the quarterly periods directed by the statutes as may be, though not exactly, and the other four as original general sessions in the intermediate spaces of time. Both have the same jurisdiction, for trial of indictments, except in cases where, by statute, the quarter sessions have the power given in terms exclusively to them. Besides which the justices in Middlesex act at their sessions in a commission of oyer and terminer, which exists in that county, and gives them additional powers, subject, however, to s. 17 of 4 & 5 Wm. IV.

c. 36 (the Central Criminal Court Act), and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38.

The sessions for Middlesex are held by adjournment within Westminster, with like jurisdiction as the Westminster sessions, which have ceased to be holden, had. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, s. 11, and see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 4, the fourth section of which enacts, that every general sessions for Middlesex shall have the powers, &c. of a general quarter sessions of that county.

The jurisdiction of the court of quarter sessions is criminal and civil, and arises from the commission of the peace itself, as settled under 18 Edw. III. c. 2, and 34 Edw. III. c. 1.

By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, intituled, 'An Act to define the jurisdiction of Justices in General and Quarter Sessions of the peace,' reciting that it is expedient that the powers of justices in general and quarter sessions of the peace, with respect to the trial of offences, be better defined, it is enacted, that after the passing of this Act, neither the justices of the peace acting in and for any county, riding, division, or liberty, nor the recorder of any borough, shall at any sessions of the peace, or at any adjournment thereof, try any person or persons for any

Treason, murder, or capital felony, or for any

Felony which, when committed by a person not previously convicted of felony, is punishable by transportation beyond the seas for life, or for any of the following offences (that is to say):

(1) Misprision of treason.

(2) Offences against the Queen's title, prerogative, person, or government, or against either House of Parliament.

(3) Offences subject to the penalties of præmunire.

(4) Blasphemy and offences against religion.

(5) Administering or taking unlawful oaths.

(6) Perjury and subornation of perjury.

(7) Making or suborning any other person to make a false oath, affirmation, or declaration, punishable as perjury or as a misdemeanor.

(8) Forgery.

(9) Unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to crops of corn, grain or pulse, or to any part of a wood, coppice, or plantation of trees, or to any heath, gorse, furze, or fern.

(10) Bigamy, and offences against the laws relating to marriage.

(11) Abduction of women and girls.

(12) Endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child.

(13) Offences against any provision of the laws relating to bankrupts and insolvents.

(14) Composing, printing, or publishing blasphemous, seditious, or defamatory libels.

(15) Bribery.

(16) Unlawful combinations and conspiracies, except conspiracies and combinations to commit any offence which such justices or recorder respectively have or has jurisdiction to try when committed by one person.

(17) Stealing or fraudulently taking or injuring or destroying records or documents belonging to any court of law or equity, or relating to any proceedings therein.

(18) Stealing or fraudulently destroying or concealing wills or testamentary papers, or any document or written instrument being or containing evidence of the title to any real estate, or any interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments.

Provided always, that nothing herein shall be construed to give authority to the justices of the peace acting in and for the cities of London and Westminster, the liberty of the Tower of London, and the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, to try any person or persons for any offence committed or alleged to be committed within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, which such justices are restrained from trying under the 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36, s. 17.

Subject to the above restrictions, it seems to be clear that where an offence is created, and declared a misdemeanor by a statute passed since the institution of the office of a justice of the peace, it may be tried by a court of quarter sessions, unless there is some special direction that it shall be heard and determined by another court, and, therefore, with the exceptions above stated, the quarter sessions have power to try all indictable offences, whether offences at the common law or created by statute. See 4 & 5 Vict. c. 56; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 16.

The 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, prohibited courts of general quarter sessions from trying the offence of pursuing game by night, when committed by three or more persons; and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25, also prohibited them from trying offences made punishable by that Act, such offences being principally malicious injuries to property. But by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 9, the latter Act is repealed, and the Malicious Injuries to Property Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), contains no such prohibitory clause. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 87, they are prohibited from trying misdemeanors against the twelve preceding sections of the Act, viz. frauds by agents, trustees, bankers, factors, &c.

Many other matters have been also rendered cognizable by quarter sessions as a court of appeal, pursuant to various statutes. The principal of them relate to friendly societies, appointing inspectors of weights and measures, district surveyors of highways, and licensing and conduct of publicans, the settlement and maintenance of the poor, the accounts of overseers and surveyors of the highways, bastardy, vagrancy, &c. Convictions and orders of magistrates are also often made the subject of appeal to the quarter sessions, and several statutes, e. g. the Highway Act and Local Acts relating to Canals, &c. have empowered sheriffs to summon juries to be empanelled at the quarter sessions for trial of various questions respecting stopping or diverting roads, compensation for damages by widening roads, taking water from mills, &c. The sessions have power to try minor offences against the game laws.—Dick. Quar. Sess. c. i.

Set-off, any counterbalance or counterclaim.

The subject of a set-off is a cross debt or claim, on which a separate action might be sustained, due to the party defendant from the party plaintiff. It is a defence created by statute, and has no existence at common law. It can only be pleaded in respect of mutual debts of a certain and definite character, and does not apply to a claim founded in damages, or in the nature of a penalty. The debt must be due in the same right and between the same parties. It must not be a mere equitable demand.

A defendant cannot now avail himself of a notice of set-off, for it must be pleaded, and a particular thereof should be delivered with the plea. Where a defendant has pleaded a set-off, but does not appear at the trial to give evidence of it, the plaintiff may either take a verdict for the whole sum he proves to be due to him, subject to be reduced to the sum really due on a balance of accounts, if the defendant will afterwards undertake not to sue for the set-off, or he may take a verdict for the smaller sum, deducting the amount of the set off really due, with the special endorsement on the postea, as a foundation for the court to order a stay of proceeding, if an action should be brought for the amount of the set-off.

Where there are cross-judgments in the same or different actions, in the same or different courts, between parties substantially the same, the one may be set off against the other, and so may costs, monies, &c.—Story on Contracts, 427; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 711–714; 1 Selw. N. P. 166.

Sets of exchange. It is common, and the practice has prevailed from a very early period, for the drawer to draw and deliver to the payee several parts, commonly called a set, of the same bill of exchange, any one part of which set being paid, the others are to be void. This is done in order to obviate delays and inconveniences which might otherwise arise from the loss or mislaying or miscarriage of the bill, and also to enable the holder to transmit the same by different conveyances to the drawee, so as to ensure the most prompt and speedy presentment for acceptance and payment. The general usage in England and America is for the drawer to deliver a set of three parts of the bill to the payee or holder.

Where a set consisting of several parts is given, each part ought to contain a condition that it shall be payable only so long as all the others remain unpaid.—Story's Bills of Exchange, 83.

Sett, a lease of a mine or minerals; also, an action.—Bell's Law Dict.

Setting spring guns, &c. It is enacted by 24° & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 31, that whosoever shall set or place, or cause to be set or placed, any spring-gun, man-trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life, or inflict grievous bodily harm upon a trespasser, or other person coming in contact therewith, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. But this enactment does not extend to gins or traps, such as are usually set with the intent of destroying vermin, or to spring-guns and other engines set in a dwelling-house for the protection thereof, from sunset to sunrise.

Settled estates. See LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES.

Settlement, the act of giving possession by legal sanction; a jointure granted to a wife; a family arrangement of property (See PROTECTOR OF THE SETTLEMENT). The obligation of a person on becoming a pauper to remain in a particular parish to which is attached a right to be maintained by that parish. See POOR LAWS.—Steer's Parish Laws.

Settlement, Act of, a name given to the statute 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, by which the Crown was limited to her present Majesty's house, being Protestants; and various provisions were made for better securing our religion, laws, and liberties, which the statute declares to be the birthright of the people of England, according to the ancient doctrine of the common law.

Settling day, the day before the account-day in the share-market, when the names of the persons for whom brokers have bought shares are furnished, and continuances effected.

Several action, a particular single action.

Several counts. Where a plaintiff has several distinct causes of action, he is allowed to pursue them cumulatively in the same action, subject to certain rules which the law prescribes as to joining such demands only as are of similar quality or character. Thus, he may join a claim of debt on bond with a claim of debt on simple contract, and pursue his remedy for both by the same action of debt. So if several distinct trespasses have been committed, these may all form the subject of one declaration in trespass. Different causes of action, of whatever kind, may be joined, except in actions of replevin and ejectments, by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 41. Such different claims or complaints, when capable of being joined, constitute different parts or sections of the declaration, and are known in pleading by the description of several counts.—Step. Plead. 302; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 233.

Several covenant, a covenant by two or more separately.

Several fishery, a right to fish derived from the owner of the soil.

It is a question, however, whether a person can have a several fishery without being owner of the soil. From the case of Seymour v. Lord Courtenay, 5 Burr. 2816, we learn that a right of several fishery does not necessarily imply an exclusive right, but may exist where no other person has a co-extensive right in the subject claimed.—2 Selw. N. P. 824. See FISHERY.

Several inheritance, an inheritance conveyed so as to descend to two persons severally, by moieties, &c.

Several tail, where land is entailed on two separately.

Several tenancy [tenura separalis, Lat.], a tenancy which is separate, and not held jointly with another.

Several pleas. The rule against duplicity does not prevent a defendant from giving distinct answers to different claims or complaints on the part of the plaintiff; nor is the defendant, in pleading different pleas to different parts of the declaration, confined to pleas of the same kind. But several pleas, avowries, or cognizances, are not allowed, unless a distinct ground of answer or defence is intended to be established in respect of each.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 275.

Severalty, Estates in. He who holds lands or tenements in severalty, or is sole tenant thereof, is he that holds them in his own right only, without any other person being joined or connected with him, in point of interest, during his estate therein.—2 Bl. Com. 179.

Severance, the separating or severing of two or more persons or things.

Seward, or Seaward, one who guards the sea-coast; custos maris.

Sewer, a trench or channel through which water flows.

The court of commissioners of sewers is a restricted one; it is a temporary tribunal, erected by virtue of a commission under the Great Seal, which formerly used to be granted pro re natâ at the pleasure of the Crown, but now at the discretion and nomination of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, and Chief Justices, pursuant to the Statute of Sewers, 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5. Their jurisdiction is to overlook the repairs of the banks and walls of the sea-coast and navigable rivers; or, with consent of a certain proportion of the owners and occupiers, to make new ones; and to cleanse such rivers, and the streams communicating therewith, and is confined to such county or particular district as the commission shall expressly name. The commissioners are a court of record, and may fine and imprison for contempt; and in the execution of their duty may proceed by jury, or upon their own view, and may make any order for the removal of any annoyances, or the safeguard and conservation of the sewers within their commission, either according to the laws and customs of Romney Marsh, or otherwise, at their own discretion. They may also assess such rates or scots upon the owners of land within their district as they shall judge necessary; and if any person refuse to pay them, the commissioners may levy the same by distress of his goods and chattels, or they may, by 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5, sell his freehold land, and by 7 Anne, c. 10, his copyhold also, in order to pay such scots and assessments. By 4 & 5 Vict. c. 45, they are also empowered, for the purposes of defraying such expenses incident to the commission as in the Act particularised, to tax in the gross in each parish such lands as are within the jurisdiction, but so that such lands shall contribute thereto in proportion to the benefit received as compared with the lands of the other parishes; which tax shall be denominated the General Sewers-Tax, and be recoverable by distress and sale. They are subject to the discretionary consideration of the Court of Queen's Bench. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 50.

By the Land Drainage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133), relating to the drainage of land for agricultural purposes, Her Majesty is empowered, upon the recommendation of the Inclosure Commissioners, to direct commissions of sewers into all parts of England, and to give them jurisdiction over such areas as, having regard to the facilities for draining, may be thought most expedient, and the powers of the commissioners are to extend to the construction of new as well as to the maintenance and improvement of old works. The Act includes all commissions of sewers granted by the Crown for the time being in force, whether granted previously to the Act or not, but does not extend to the metropolis. It also provides for the constitution of elective drainage districts, and for the appointment of boards in such districts with the same powers as commissioners of sewers. See 3 Step. Com. 461. As to Metropolitan Sewers, see 18 & 19 Vict. cc. 30, 120; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 45.

Sexagesima Sunday, the second Sunday before Lent, being about the sixtieth day before Easter.

Sexhindeni, or Sexhindmen, the middle thanes, valued at 600*s.* See HINDENI HOMINES.

Sextery lands, lands given to a church or religious house for maintenance of a sexton or sacristan.—Cowel.

Sexton (probably from sacristan), the keeper of things belonging to divine worship. He is ordinarily chosen by the rector, but sometimes by the parishioners, according to custom. His particular duties are to cleanse the church, to open the pews, to fill up the graves, to provide candles and other necessaries, and to prevent disturbance in the church.—59 Geo. III. c. 134, ss. 6, 10; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104.

Shack (at large), a liberty of winter pasturage.

Shack, Common of, the right of persons occupying lands lying together in the same common field, to turn out their cattle after harvest to feed promiscuously in such field.

Sham plea, a vexatious or false defence, resorted to for purposes of delay and annoyance. It is treated as a nullity.

Shares in public undertakings. The property in public undertakings connected with land (such as mines, canals, and railroads, to which the public subscribe) is in the nature of realty, so far as regards the land itself, or the right of using it; and is for some purposes of the same nature as regards the fixtures connected with the concern. But where the property is vested by charter or Act of Parliament in a body corporate, the shares of the individual corporators in the concern itself are personal and not real estate; for such shares are merely the rights which each individual possesses as a partner to a share in the surplus profit derived from the employment of the capital, which is always a mixed fund, consisting in part, at least, of personal chattels, as well as lands and fixtures. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, s. 15; and the Joint Stock Companies' Act, and the Company's Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 22), whereby the shares in companies constituted under those Acts are personal estate, and not in the nature of real estate.—2 Step. Com. 236, 237.

Sharping-corn, a customary gift of corn which, at every Christmas, the farmers in some parts of England give to their smith for sharpening their plough-irons, harrow-tines, &c.—Blount.

Shaster, the instrument of government or instruction; any book of instructions, particularly containing Divine ordinances.—Indian.

Shaw, a grove or wood, an underwood.

Shawatores, soldiers.—Cowel.

Sheading, a riding, tithing, or division in the Isle of Man, where the whole island is divided into six sheadings, in each of which there is a coroner or chief constable appointed by the delivery of a rod at the Tinewald Court or annual convention.—King's Isle of Man, 7.

Sheep-silver, a service turned into money, which was paid in respect that anciently the tenants used to wash the lord's sheep.

Sheep-stealing, or killing sheep with intent to steal, a felony.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 10 & 11.

Shelley's case, Rule in. Intimately connected with the quantity of estate which a tenant may hold in realty is the antique feudal doctrine generally known as the rule in Shelley's case, which is reported by Lord Coke in 1 Rep. 93 b. (23 Eliz. in C. B.) This rule was not first laid down or established in that case, but was then simply admitted in argument as a well-founded and settled rule of law, and has always since been quoted as the rule in Shelley's case.

A thorough knowledge of the application of this rule is of great practical importance. See the elaborate exposition of the rule by Mr. Fearne, who debates it as the first exception to his fourth class of contingent remainders in his valuable essay on their learning, c. I., § V. pp. 27–208; and also Mr. Preston's Elementary Treatise on Estates (vol. 1, c. iii., pp. 263–419, 2nd edit.), in which 'the end proposed is, by negative and affirmative propositions, to exhibit, in a discussion of that rule, the instances in which several limitations, one to the ancestor, the other to the heirs, heirs of the body, or issue of the body of that person, do and do not give the inheritance to the ancestor.'

The rule may be described thus:—Where a life freehold either legal or equitable in realty (whether of freehold or copyhold tenure) is limited by any assurance to a person, and by the same assurance the inheritance of the same quality, i. e. either legal or equitable, is limited by way of remainder (with or without the interposition of any other estate) to his heirs or the heirs of his body, such remainder is immediately executed in possession in the person so taking the life-freehold, the word 'heirs' being treated as a word of limitation and not of purchase, so that the life-tenant takes the inheritance, which is neither contingent nor in abeyance; that is to say, where the inheritance is to his heirs or right heirs, he takes the fee-simple; and where it is to the heirs of his body, an estate-tail general.—1 Step. Com. 339 & 382.

In Coke's Reports in verse the rule has been rhymed thus:—

'Where ancestors a freehold take,
The words, "his heirs," a limitation make;'

which may serve to refresh the memory.

As examples of the application of the rule, take the following:—Land is limited to A. for life, remainder to his right heirs, the rule does not treat this remainder as contingent, but confers it upon A. at once, whereupon his life-estate merges in the remainder, and he takes the entire interest, i. e. the fee-simple. Again: Land is limited to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to the heirs male of A.'s body, the second remainder vests in A. as a remainder in tail male general, and is not in contingency or abeyance, nevertheless waiting for, and continuing expectant on, the determination of B.'s life estate, which is expectant on A.'s death; but after A.'s death, and the determination of the mesne remainder to B., A.'s heir in tail male general shall enjoy the land as heir, and not as purchaser.

This rule is of positive institution at variance with rules of construction; for while the latter seek for the intention of parties, and strive at its accomplishment, the former combats the intention—a conflict which frequently raises immense difficulties as to whether the rule or intention should prevail. In the operation of the rule on the limitations of the two above-stated examples, it certainly contradicts the meaning of the assurance, and the intent of the parties. Two estates are created, a particular estate in the ancestor, and a remainder in his heirs. In the absence of the rule, the heir would have taken an original and independent estate by purchase, not derived from or controllable by his ancestor; but the operation of the rule places the whole power over the inheritance in the ancestor, who can partially or totally defeat the expectation of his relations.

Shepway, Court of, a court held before the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. A writ of error lies from the mayor and jurats of each port to the Lord Warden in this court, and thence to the Queen's Bench. The civil jurisdiction of the Cinque Ports is abolished by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48.

Shereffe, the body of the lordship of Caerdiff in South Wales, excluding the members of it.

Sheriff, Shire-reve, or Shiriff [fr. scire, Sax., fr. scyran, to divide, and gerefa, a guardian (vicecomes)], the chief officer of the Crown in every county or shire, who does all the sovereign's business in the county, the Crown by letters-patent committing the custody of the county to him alone.

The judges, together with the other great officers and privy councillors, meet in the Exchequer on the morrow of St. Martin yearly; and then and there the judges propose three persons for each county, to be reported, if approved of, to the Queen, who afterwards appoints one of them to be sheriff, and such appointment generally takes place about the end of the following Hilary Term. If a sheriff die in office, the appointment of another is the mere act of the Crown.

By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99, it is provided that whenever any person shall be duly pricked or nominated by the sovereign to be sheriff of any county, except the county palatine of Lancaster, the same shall be forthwith notified in the London Gazette, and a warrant made out and signed by the clerk of the privy council, and transmitted to the person so appointed; and the appointment of sheriff thereby made shall be as valid to all intents as if it had been made by patent under the Great Seal as formerly; and the sheriff so appointed shall thereupon, and upon taking the accustomed oath of office, exercise all the authorities usually enjoyed by such officers. The oath of office here required does not affect the sheriffs of London or Middlesex. A charter of Henry I. granted the election of the sheriffs of London and Middlesex to the citizens of London for ever, upon the condition of their paying 300*l.* a year into the king's exchequer. As to their approval by the Crown, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 42. See also Pulling's Customs of London, 134. The Earl of Thanet was hereditary Sheriff of Westmoreland till his death in 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 42, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 30). See Westmoreland, Shrievalty of.) The counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon have one and the same sheriff. Sheriffs in Wales are assigned as in England, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 11.

Sheriffs, by virtue of several old statutes, are to continue in their office no longer than one year, but a sheriff may be appointed durante bene placito, and so is the form of the royal writ. Therefore till a new sheriff be named his office cannot be determined. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99, s. 7, he shall, on expiration of his office, deliver to his successor a correct list of all prisoners in his custody, and of all unexecuted process. No man that has served the office of sheriff for one year can be compelled to serve again within three years after, if there be other sufficient person within the county.—1 Ric. II. c. 11. The discharge of the office is in general compulsory upon the party chosen; and if he refuse to serve, having no legal exemption, he is liable to indictment or information. Certain persons, such as militia-officers, practising barristers, attorneys, and prisoners for debt, are not liable to serve; nor are persons under disability by judgment of law (as in the case of outlawry) to be appointed. By 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 21, s. 7, no person shall be assigned for sheriff unless he have sufficient lands within the same to answer the Crown and people. And this is the only qualification required for the office.

His powers and duties are various:—

Judicially, he superintends the election of knights of the shire, coroners, and verderors, and proclaims outlawries and the like. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, as to trials of issues from the superior courts not exceeding 20*l.*

As keeper of the Queen's peace, both by common law and special commission, he is the first man in the county, and superior in rank to any nobleman therein during his office.

Ministerially, he is bound to execute all civil and criminal process issuing out of the superior courts, and in this respect is considered an officer of these courts. He is also the returning officer for his county, and he opens the elections for members of Parliament, and has various duties to discharge in reference to such elections. See 24 George II. c. 24, s. 3, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 1, s. 2.

As the Queen's bailiff, it is his business to preserve her rights within his bailiwick, i. e. county.

He has under him several inferior officers, as an under-sheriff, bailiffs, gaolers, &c., to assist him in the execution of his several offices.

By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99, it is provided that every sheriff shall, within one calendar month next after the notification of his appointment in the Gazette, by writing, under his hand, nominate some fit person to be his under-sheriff, and transmit a duplicate thereof to the clerk of the peace, to be by him filed among the records of his office; and that every under-sheriff (except of London and Middlesex) shall, before he enters on the execution of his office, take the oath of office.

By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, every sheriff is also directed to appoint a sufficient deputy, having an office within a mile of the Inner Temple-hall, for the receipt of writs, granting warrants thereon, making returns thereto, and accepting all rules and orders made as to the execution of any process or writ addressed to the sheriff.—2 Step. Com. 644, et seq.

Sheriff Clerk, the clerk of the Sheriff's Court in Scotland, who alone can be notary to the seisins given by the sheriff, proceeding on precepts for infefting heirs holding of the Crown.

Sheriff Court Houses in Scotland Act, 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 79.

Sheriff in that part or behalf, a person appointed to supply the place of the sheriff for executing process in Scotland.

Sheriffalty, Sheriffdom, Sheriffship, or Sheriffwick [vicecomitatus, Lat.], the office or jurisdiction of a sheriff.

Sheriff-geld, a rent formerly paid by a sheriff, and it is prayed that the sheriff in his account may be discharged thereof.—Rot. Parl. 50 Edw. III.

Sheriff-tooth, a tenure by the service of providing entertainment for the sheriff at his county-courts; a common tax, formerly levied for the sheriff's diet.

Sheriffs' Court in London, a tribunal having cognizance of personal actions under the London (City) Small Debts Act, 1852, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 157, s. 3. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 71; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 77; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, s. 99; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 157; and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104.

Sheriffs' officers, bailiffs, who are either bailiffs of hundreds or bound-bailiffs.

Sheriffs' tourn or rotation, a court of record held twice every year, within a month after Easter and Michaelmas, before the sheriff, in different parts of the county, being indeed only the turn of the sheriff to keep a court-leet in each respective hundred; this, therefore, is the great court-leet of the county, as the county-court is the court-baron; for out of this, for the ease of the sheriff, was taken the court-leet, or view of frank-pledge, which see.

Shewing [monstratio, Lat.], to be quit of attachment in a court, in plaints shewed and not avowed.

Shifting use, a secondary or executory use, which, when executed, operates in derogation of a preceding estate; as land conveyed to the use of A. and his heirs, with proviso that when B. pays a certain sum of money, the estate shall go to the use of C. and his heirs.

Shilling [fr. solidus, Lat.; scilling, Sax.] among the English Saxons passed for 5*d.*, afterwards it represented 16*d.*, and often 20*d.* In the reign of the Conqueror it was of the same denominative value as at this day.—Domesday.

Shilwit. See CHILDWIT.

Ship-money, an imposition formerly levied on port-towns and other places for fitting out ships; revived by Charles I., and abolished in the same reign.—17 Car. I. c. 14.

Shipper, or Skipper, master of a ship; also a seaman.

Ships, British, Laws relating to. See NAVIGATION ACTS, and 2 Selw. N. P. 1230–1251.

Ship's-husband, a peculiar sort of agent, appointed by the owner of a ship, to look after the repairs, equipment, management, and other concerns of the ship. His duties are: (1) To see to the proper outfit of the vessel in the repairs adequate to the voyage, and in the tackle and furniture necessary for a seaworthy ship. (2) To have a proper master, mate, and crew for the ship, so that in this respect it shall be seaworthy. (3) To see to the due furnishing of provisions and stores, according to the necessities of the voyage. (4) To see to the regularity of all the clearances from the custom-house, and the regularity of the registry. (5) To settle the contracts, and provide for the payment of the furnishings, which are requisite in the performance of those duties. (6) To enter into proper charter-parties, or engage the vessel for general freight, under the usual conditions; and to settle for freight and adjust averages with the merchant. (7) To preserve the proper certificates, surveys, and documents, in case of future disputes with insurers or freighters, and to keep regular books of the ship.—1 Bell. Com. 410, s. 428, 4th edit.; Story's Agency, 31.

Ship's papers, documents required for the manifestation of the property of the ship and cargo, &c.

They are of two sorts: 1st, those required by the law of a particular country, as the certificate of registry, license, charter-party, bills of lading and of health, required by the law of England to be on board all British ships; 2nd, those required by the law of nations to be on board neutral ships, to vindicate their title to that character; they are the passport, sea-brief, or sea-letter, proofs of property, the muster-roll or rôle d'équipage; the charter-party, the bills of lading and invoices, the log-book or ship's journal, and the bill of health.—1 Marshall on Insur. c. 9, s. 6.

Shire [fr. scyran, Sax., to divide], a part or portion of the kingdom; called also a county [comitatus, Lat.] King Alfred first divided this country into satrapias, now called shires; shires into centurias, now called hundreds; and these again into decennas, now called tithings.—Leg. Alfred. See Brompton, 956.

Shire-clerk, he that keeps the county court.

Shire-man, or Scyre-man, anciently judge of the county, by whom trials for land, &c., were determined before the Conquest.

Shiremote, an assembly of the county or the shire at the assizes, &c.

Shire-reve, a sheriff, which see.

Shoofaa, pre-emption, or a power of possessing property which has been sold, by paying a sum equal to that paid by the purchaser.—Mac. Moo. Law, 47.

Shooting at the Queen. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 51, it is enacted, that if any person shall wilfully discharge or point, aim, or present at the person of the Queen, any gun or other arms, whether containing explosive materials or not, or shall strike at or attempt to throw anything upon the Queen's person, or produce any fire-arms or other arms, or any explosive or dangerous matter near Her Majesty's person, with intent in any of these cases to injure or alarm her, or commit a breach of the peace, he shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and liable to penal servitude for not more than seven nor less than three years; or to be imprisoned for not more than three years, and whipped not more than thrice during that period.

Shooting or wounding, or causing any grievous bodily harm, with intention to maim, disfigure, or disable, or to do some other grievous bodily harm, or with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detaining of any person, a felony. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 18.

Shoplifter, one who privately steals goods out of shops, &c.

Short-cause, a suit in chancery where there is only a simple point for discussion. As to setting it down, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 441.

Short-entry. It takes place when a bill or note, not due, has been sent to a bank for collection, and an entry of it is made in the customer's bank-book, stating the amount in an inner column, and carrying it into the accounts between the parties when it has been paid. See ENTERING SHORT.

Short-ford, q. d. fore-close. The ancient custom of the city of Exeter is, when the lord of the fee cannot be answered rent due to him out of his tenement, and no distress can be levied for the same, the lord is to come to the tenement and there take a stone, or some other dead thing of the said tenement, and bring it before the mayor and bailiffs; and this he must do seven quarter days successively; and if on the seventh quarter day the lord is not satisfied his rent and arrears, then the tenant shall be adjudged to the lord to hold the same a year and a day; and forthwith proclamation is to be made in the court, that if any man claim any title to the said tenement he must appear within the year and a day next following, and satisfy the lord of the said rent and arrears. But if no appearance be made, and the rent not paid, the lord comes again to the court and prays that, according to the custom, the said tenement be adjudged to him in his demesne as of fee, which is done accordingly, so as the lord has thenceforth the said tenement with the appurtenances to him and his heirs. This custom is called short-ford.—Izaeli's Antiq. Exet. 48.

A like custom in London by the ancient statute of Gavelet, attributed to 10 Edw. II., is called forschot or forschoke.

Shroff, Shrof, a banker or money-changer.—Indian.

Shroud stealing. If any one, in taking up a dead body, steal the shroud or other apparel, it will be felony; for the property therein remains in the executor, or whoever was at the charge of the funeral.—3 Inst. 110; 1 Hale, P. C. 535.

Shrievalty, sheriffalty.

Shrieve, a corruption of sheriff.

Si actio, the conclusion of a plea to an action when the defendant demands judgment, if the plaintiff ought to have his action, &c.

Si à jure discedas vagus eris, et erunt omnia omnibus incerta.—Co. Litt. 227.—(If you depart from the law you will wander, and all things will be uncertain to every body.)

Si assuetis mederi possis nova non sunt tentanda.—10 Co. 142.—(If you can remedy defects by that which is usual, novelties should not be attempted.)

Sica, Sicha, a ditch.

Sich, a little current of water, which is dry in summer; a water furrow or gutter.

Sicius, a sort of money current among the ancient English, of the value of 2*d.*

Sic interpretandum est ut verba accipiantur cum effectu.—3 Inst. 80.—(Such an interpretation is to be made that the words may have effect.)

Sicut ad quæstionem facti, non respondent judices, ita ad quæstionem juris, non respondent juratores.—Co. Litt. 295.—(Just as the judges do not decide on a question of fact, so the jury do not decide on a question of law.)

Sicut beatius est, ita majus est, dare quam accipere. — 6 Co. 57. — (Just as it is more blessed, so is it more magnanimous, to give than to receive.)

Sicut alias, as at another time, or heretofore.

Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas.—9 Co. 59.—(Use your own rights so that you do not hurt another.)

Sicut natura nil facit per saltum, ita nec lex. Co. Litt. 238.—(In the same way as nature does nothing by a bound, so neither the law.)

Sicut subditus regi tenetur ad obedientiam, ita rex subdito tenetur ad protectionem, meritò igitur ligeantia dicitur à ligando, quia continet in se duplex ligamen.—7 Co. 5.—(Inasmuch as a subject is bound to obey the king, so the king is bound to protect the subject; well, therefore, is allegiance derived from the word ligando (to bind), because it contains a double binding.)

Side-bar-rules. See RULES.

Sidelings, meers between or on the sides of ridges of arable land.

Sides-men, Synods-men, or Quest-men, persons who were formerly appointed in large parishes to assist the churchwardens in inquiring into the manners of inordinate livers, and in presenting offenders at visitations. See QUEST-MAN.

Siens, scions or descendants.

Si fecerit te securum, a species of original writ, so called from the words of the writ, which directed the sheriff to cause the defendant to appear in court, without any option given him, provided the plaintiff gave the sheriff security effectually to prosecute his claim.

Sigil [fr. sigillum, Lat.], seal, signature.

Sigillum est cera impressa, quia cera sine impressione non est sigillum.—3 Inst. 169.—(A seal is a piece of wax impressed, because wax without an impression is not a seal.)

Sigla [fr. segel, Sax.], a sail.

Signal stations. See 53 Geo. III. c. 128.

Signature, a sign or mark impressed upon anything; a stamp, a mark; the name of a person written and subscribed by himself.

Signet, a seal commonly used for the sign-manual of the sovereign. See ROYAL SIGNET.

In Scotland it is the seal by which the Queen's letters or writs, for the purpose of private justice, are now authenticated.

Clerks to the signet, or writers to the signet, in Scotland, are nearly the same as attornies in England.

Significavit, a writ issuing out of the Chancery upon certificate given by the ordinary of a man's standing excommunicate by the space of forty days, for the keeping him in prison till he submit himself to the authority of the church. Obsolete.

Also, another writ, addressed to the justices of the bench, commanding them to stay any suit depending between such and such parties by reason of an excommunication alleged against the plaintiff, &c.—Reg. Orig. 7.

Sign-manual, the royal signature. See ROYAL SIGN-MANUAL. Also, the signature of any one's name in his own handwriting.

Signum, a cross prefixed as a sign of assent and approbation to a charter or deed, used by the Saxons.

Silentiarius, one of the privy council; also, an usher, who sees good rule and silence kept in court.

Silentium in senatu est vitium.—12 Co. 94.—(Silence in the senate is a fault.)

Silent leges inter arma.—4 Inst. 70.—(The laws are silent amidst arms.)

Silva cædua, wood under twenty years' growth.)

Si meliores sunt quos ducit amor, plures sunt quos corrigit timor.—Co. Litt. 392.—(If love leads the better, fear restrains the many.)

Similiter [Lat.] (in like manner). Formerly when an issue of fact was tendered, the words were as follows: 'and of this the defendant puts himself upon the country;' or thus, 'and this the plaintiff prays may be inquired of by the country;' the issue and form of trial were then both accepted on the other side (unless there appeared grounds for demurrer), by the words following: 'and the plaintiff (or the defendant, as the case may be) doth the like,' which latter words were called the similiter. Joinder in issue, pursuant to C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 79, has superseded the similiter.

The want of a similiter by the prosecutor in criminal cases is cured by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 20.

Similitudo legalis est, casuum diversorum inter se collatorum similis ratio; quod in uno similium valet, valebit in altero. Dissimilium, dissimilis est ratio.—Co. Litt. 191.—(Legal similarity is a similar reason which governs various cases when compared with each other, for what avails in one of similar cases will avail in the other. Of things dissimilar, the reason is dissimilar.)

Simonia est voluntas sive desiderium emendi vel vendendi spiritualia vel spiritualibus adhærentia. Contractus ex turpi causâ et contra bonos mores.—Hob. 167.—(Simony is the will or desire of buying or selling spiritualities, or things pertaining thereto. It is a contract founded on a bad cause, and against morality.)

Simonia est vox ecclesiastica, à 'Simone' illo 'Mago' deducta, qui donum Spiritus Sancti pecunia emi putavit.—3 Inst. 153.—(Simony is an ecclesiastical word, derived from that Simon Magus, who thought to buy the gift of the Holy Ghost with money.)

Simony [venditio rei sacræ, Lat.], an unlawful contract for presenting a clergyman to a benefice. It works a forfeiture, whereby the right of presentation to a living is forfeited, and vested pro hâc vice in the Crown.—31 Eliz. c. 6.

Many questions have arisen with regard to what is and what is not simony; and among others these points seem to be clearly settled:—

(1) That the sale of an advowson (whether the living be full or not) is not simoniacal, unless connected with a corrupt contract or design as to the next presentation, though if an advowson be granted during the vacancy of the benefice, the presentation on that vacancy can in no case pass by the grant.

(2) That to purchase a next presentation, the living being actually vacant, is open and notorious simony, this being expressly in contravention of the statute.

(3) That for a clerk to bargain for a next presentation, the incumbent being sick and about to die, was simony even before the Statute of Anne, and now by that statute to purchase, either in his own name or another's the next presentation, and be thereupon presented at any future time to the living, is direct and palpable simony.

(4) But a bargain by any other person for the next presentation (even if the incumbent be in extremis), if without the privity and without any view to the nomination of the particular clerk afterwards presented, is not simony.

(5) That if a simoniacal contract be made with the patron, the clerk presented not being privy thereto, the presentation for that turn shall indeed devolve to the Crown, as a punishment of the guilty patron, but the clerk who is innocent does not otherwise incur any disability or forfeiture.

(6) That bonds given to pay money to charitable uses, on receiving a presentation to a living, are not simoniacal, provided the patron or his relations be not benefited thereby, for this is no corrupt consideration moving to the patron.—3 Step. Com. 76, and 1 Selw. N. P. 590.

Simple contract, a parole promise, which may be either verbal or written, but not under seal.

Simple contract-debt, one where the contract upon which the obligation arises is neither ascertained by matter of record nor yet by deed or special instrument, but by mere oral evidence the most simple of any, or by notes unsealed, which are capable of a more easy proof, and therefore only better than a verbal promise.—2 Bl. Com. 466.

Simple deposit, a deposit made, according to the civil law, by one or more persons having a common interest.

Simple destination, the settlement by the proprietor of an estate in Scotland by which he substitutes the persons who are to succeed one another.

Simple larceny, plain theft, without aggravation, as distinguished from compound, mixed, or complicated larceny. See LARCENY.

Simple trust, where property is vested in one person upon trust for another, and the nature of the trust, not being qualified by the settlor, is left to the construction of law. In this case the cestui que trust has jus habendi, or the right to be put into actual possession of the property, and jus disponendi, or the right to call upon the trustee to execute conveyances of the legal estate as the cestui que trust directs.—Lew. on Trusts, 21.

Simple warrandice, an obligation to warrant or secure from all subsequent and future deeds of the grantor.—Scotch phrase.

Simplex, simple, single.

Simplex beneficium, a minor dignity in a cathedral or collegiate church, or any other ecclesiastical benefice, as distinguished from a cure of souls. It may therefore be held with any parochial cure, without coming under the prohibitions against pluralities.

Simplex commendatio non obligat.—(A simple recommendation, as of goods, &c. by a vendor, binds not.)

Simplex justiciarius, a style formerly used for any puisnè judge who was not chief in any court.

Simplex obligatio, a single unconditional bond.

Simplicitas est legibus amica: et nimia subtilitas injure reprobatur.—4 Co. 8.—(Simplicity is favorable to the laws: and too much subtilty in law is to be reprobated.)

Simpliciter [Lat.] (in a summary way, or simply).

Simulated and Concealed Insanity. There is no disease, says Zacchias, more easily feigned, or more difficult of detection, than the one under consideration. And hence, many great men of ancient times, in order to elude the danger that impended over them, have pretended it; as David, Ulysses, Solon, and Brutus. On the other hand, Dr. Ray declares that, 'those who have been longest acquainted with the manners of the insane, and whose practical acquaintance with the disease furnishes the most satisfactory guarantee of the correctness of their opinions, assure us that insanity is not easily feigned; and consequently that no attempt at imposition can long escape the efforts of one properly qualified to expose it.' Georget does not believe 'that a person who has not made the insane a subject of study can simulate madness so as to deceive a physician well acquainted with the disease.'—Des Maladies Mentales, 60.

Mr. Haslam declares that, 'to sustain the character of a paroxysm of active insanity would require a continuity of exertion beyond the power of a sane person.'—Med. Jurisp. of Insan. 322. Dr. Conolly affirms, 'that he can hardly imagine a case which would be proof against an efficient system of observation.'—Inquiry concerning Indic. Insan. 467. Another writer, while admitting that attempts to deceive are sometimes successful, on account of the imperfect knowledge of the operations of the mind in health and disease possessed by medical men in general, observes, however, that when we consider the 'very peculiar complex phenomena which characterize true madness, and reflect on the general ignorance of those who attempt to imitate them, we have no right to expect such a finished picture as could impose on persons well acquainted with the real disease.'—Cyc. Prac. Med. art. 'Feigned Diseases.'

With such authority before us, to urge as an objection against the free admission of insanity, in excuse for crime, the extreme difficulty of detecting attempts to feign it, can no longer be anything more than the plea of ignorance or indolence. The only effect such difficulty should have on the minds of those who are to form their opinions by the evidence they hear, should be to impress them with a stronger sense of the necessity of an intimate practical acquaintance with insanity on the part of the medical witness, and convince them that, without this qualification, the testimony of the physician is but little better than that of anyone else.

As to the tests to detect simulated insanity, consult Beck's Med. Jurisp. 447.

Among us, the choice of the means for establishing the existence of insanity, when concealed, is left to individual sagacity. This no doubt is sufficient, where great practical acquaintance with insanity readily suggests the course best adapted to each particular case; but the great majority of medical men will feel the need of some system or order of proceeding that will simplify their inquiries, and render them more efficient. The French arrange their means into three general divisions or classes, which are made use of each in succession, when the preceding class has failed of its object. They are called: (1) the interrogatory, (2) the continued observation, and (3) the inquest.

(1) The interrogatory embraces only those means of observation which are applicable on a personal interview with the patient. After learning generally his moral and intellectual character, his education, and habits of living, the duration and nature of his mental delusion (if it can be ascertained from his acquaintances), and the state of his relations to others; and after observing the expression of his countenance, his demeanor, and general appearance, a direct examination of his case may be entered upon.

(2) The continued observation, systematically continued for some time, may establish the fact of insanity in doubtful cases, after several personal interviews have completely failed. Opportunities, therefore, should be demanded for visiting the patient freely and frequently; for watching him at times when he supposes himself unobserved; and for exercising a general surveillance over his conduct and conversation. Those about him should be enjoined to watch his movements; and he should often, but cautiously, be led to speak of the motives of those who are anxious to prove his insanity. It often happens too that those who are most successful in concealing every indication of disordered mind in their conversation, will betray themselves the moment they commit their thoughts to paper.

(3) The inquest. When the above means fail, our inquiries must take a wider range, and be directed to the previous history of the patient, as may be known by the testimony of friends and relations and those who have been connected with him in business, or had any other good opportunity of becoming acquainted with his mental condition. 'The inquest,' says Georget, 'consists in collecting information respecting the patient's condition before and after the presumed disease, and the causes suspected to have impaired his mind. For this purpose, we consult his writings, and recur to the testimony of those who have been about him and conversed with him; who have been able to observe him closely, and to witness his insane actions, and his irrational discourse. We should be particularly careful, however, to require of witnesses facts rather than opinions. We should ascertain whether madness be a disease of the family; whether he have already evinced a degree of singularity in his moral and intellectual character, or exaltation of any kind; whether he have been exposed to the influence of powerful causes, such as chagrins, severe and repeated crosses, reverses of fortune, &c.; whether, without any real motive, he has manifested any change of his habits, tastes, or affections; in short, we should inquire into all those circumstances which so frequently precede the development.'—Des Maladies Mentales, 57; Ray's Med. Jurisp. of Insanity, c. xvi.

Simulatio latens, a species of feigned disease, in which disease is actually present, but where the symptoms are falsely aggravated, and greater sickness is pretended than really exists.—Beck's Med. Jurisp. 3.

Simul cum [Lat.] (together with).

Si mulier nobilis nupserit ignobili viro, desinit esse nobilis: nisi nobilitas fuit nativa.—4 Co. 118.—(If a noble woman marry a man not noble, she loses her nobility, unless she were noble by birth.)

Sinderesis, a natural power of the soul, set in the highest part thereof, moving and stirring it to good, and abhorring evil. And therefore sinderesis never sinneth nor erreth. And this sinderesis our Lord put in man, to the intent that the order of things should be observed. And therefore sinderesis is called by some men the law of reason, for it ministereth the principles of the law of reason, the which be in every man by nature, in that he is a reasonable creature.—Doctor and Student, 39.

Sine assensu capitali, an abolished writ where a bishop, dean, prebendary, or master of an hospital, aliened the lands holden in right of his bishopric, deanery, house, &c., without the assent of the chapter or fraternity, in which case his successor should have this writ.—F. N. B. 195.

Sinecure [fr. sine, Lat., without, and cura, care], an office which has revenue without any employment.

Sinecure rector, a rector without cure of souls. Sinecure rectories are now abolished by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 48. See 3 Step. Com. 26.

Sine die [Lat.] (without day, or indefinitely).

Single avail of marriage, the value of the tocher or marriage portion of the vassal's wife, which is modified to two years' rent of the vassal's free estate.—Scotch term.

Single bond [simplex obligatio, Lat.], a deed whereby the obligor obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators to pay a certain sum of money to the obligee at a day named.

Single combat, Trial by. See BATTEL.

Single entry, an entry made to charge or to credit an individual or thing, as distinguished from double entry, which is an entry of both the debit and credit accounts of a transaction. See DOUBLE ENTRY.

Single escheat, when all a person's movables fall to the Crown as a casualty, because of his being declared rebel.

Singular, the number of one. By the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, it is enacted that words in Acts of Parliament importing the singular shall include the plural, and the plural the singular, unless the contrary is expressly provided.

Singular succession. A purchaser is so termed in the Scotch law, in contradistinction to the heir of a landed proprietor, who succeeds to the whole heritage by regular title, of succession or universal representation, whereas the purchaser acquires right solely by the single title acquired by the disposition of the former proprietor.

Sinking Fund, the surplus revenue of the kingdom beyond the actual expenditure, which is directed to be applied towards the reduction of the National Debt; it is regulated by 10 Geo. IV. c. 27, amended by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 24, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 38.

Si non omnes, Writ of, a writ on association of justices, by which, if all in commission cannot meet at the day assigned, it is allowed that two or more of them may finish the business.—F. N. B. 185; Reg. Orig. 202. And after the writ of association, it is usual to make out a writ of si non omnes, addressed to the first justices, and also to those who are associated with them, which, reciting the purport of the two former commissions, commands the justices, that if all of them cannot conveniently be present, such a number of them may proceed, &c.—F. N. B. 111.

Sipessocua, a franchise, liberty, or hundred.

Si plures conditiones ascriptæ fuerunt donationi conjunctim, omnibus est parendum; et ad veritatem copulativè requiritur quod utraque pars sit vera: si divisim, cuilibet vel alteri eorum satis est obtemperare; et in disjunctivis, sufficit alteram partem esse veram.—Co. Litt. 225.—(If several conditions have been conjunctively written in a gift, the whole of them must be complied with; and with respect to their truth, it is necessary that every part be true taken jointly; if the conditions are separate, it is sufficient to comply with either one or other of them; and being disjunctive, that one or the other be true.)

Siquis (if any one, Lat.), an advertisement; a notification.

Si quis custos fraudem pupillo fecerit, à tutelâ removendus est.—Jenk. Cent. 39.—(If a guardian do fraud to his ward, he shall be removed from his guardianship.)

Si quis plures filios habuerit, jus proprietatis primò descendit ad primogenitum; eò quod inventus primus est in rerum naturâ.—Co. Litt. 14.—(If a man have several sons, the right of property shall, in the first place, descend to the elder of them; inasmuch as by the order of nature he stands in the first place.)

Si quis prægnantem uxorem reliquit, non videtur sine liberis decessisse.—Reg. Jur. Civ.—(If a man leave his wife pregnant, he shall not be considered to have died without children.)

Si quis unum percusserit, cum alium percutere vellet, in felonia tenetur.—3 Inst. 51.—(If a man kill one, meaning to kill another, he is held guilty of felony.)

Sircar, a government; a man of business.—Indian.

Si recognoscat, a writ that, according to the old books, lay for a creditor against his debtor, who had acknowledged before the sheriff in the county court that he owed his creditor such a sum received of him.—O. N. B. 68.

Sir John Hobhouse's Act, 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 60, passed for regulation of vestries.

Sise, corrupted from assise.

Si suggestio non sit vera, literæ patentes vacuæ sunt.—10 Co. 113.—(If the suggestion be not true the letters-patent are void.)

Sites for schools. See 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 37, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 49, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 24, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 49, and 21 Vict. c. 31.

Sithcundman, the high constable of a hundred.

Sittings in London and Westminster. London and Westminster are not comprised within any circuit, but courts of Nisi Prius are held there for the same purpose in and after every term, before the chief or other judges of the superior courts, at what are called the London and Westminster sittings. Criminal cases are tried at the Central Criminal Court. As to sittings in Chancery, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 9.

Sittings in banc, sittings of the judges on the benches of their respective courts at Westminster, at which they decide matters of law and transact other judicial business, as distinguished from Nisi Prius sittings, at which they superintend the trial of matters of fact.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 173.

Situs [Lat.], situation, location.

Six Articles, Law of, made by 31 Hen. VIII. c. 14. This famous Act was styled 'An Act for abolishing Diversity of Opinions,' and it enforced conformity to six of the strongest points in the Romish religion, under the severest penalties. The preamble states, that 'the King hoped that a full and perfect resolution of the said articles should make a perfect concord and unity amongst all his subjects.' The ready way to effect this, it was thought, would be to establish them by law, since the convocation of bishops and learned men had agreed upon them as settled orthodox doctrine. It was therefore enacted, first, that if any one by word, writing, printing, ciphering, or any otherwise, did teach, preach, dispute, or hold opinion against the real presence, he should suffer death as a heretic by burning, and forfeit as in case of high treason; second, that if any one preached in any sermon, or collection openly made, or taught in any common school or congregation, or obstinately affirmed or defended that the communion in both kinds was necessary; or thirdly, that priests might marry; or fourthly, that vows of chastity might be broken; or fifthly, that private masses should not be used; or sixthly, that auricular confession was not expedient; it should be adjudged felony. These points were declared to have been 'determined and resolved by the most godly study, pain, and travail of his Majesty; for which his most humble and obedient subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal and the commons, in parliament assembled, did not only render and give unto his highness their most high and hearty thanks.' Provisions were added, that if any priest, or any other who had vowed chastity, did marry, or contract matrimony; or if any priest who was or should be married, did carnally use his wife, or any woman to whom he was contracted, or was openly conversant or familiar with, both the man and the woman should be guilty of felony. This severe enactment against unchaste practices was not relished by the Popish clergy, and is said to have been put in by Cromwell, to make this bloody law cut with two edges. If that was the design; the clergy got relieved from the well-intended stroke the next year; when, by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 10, the latter part of the law was changed from felony to forfeiture and imprisonment. Repealed by 1 Eliz. c. 1.—4 Reeves, 278.

Six Clerks in Chancery, officers who received and filed all proceedings, signed office copies, attended court to read the pleadings, &c. They were abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Skyvinage, or Skevinage, the precincts of Calais.—27 Hen. IV. c. 2.

Slains, Letters of, letters heretofore subscribed by the relations of a person slain, declaring that they had received an assignment or recompense, and containing an application to the Crown for a pardon to the murderer.—Scotch practice.

Slander, the malicious defamation of a person in his reputation, profession, or business, by words; as a libel is by writing, &c. It is actionable. See 2 Selw. N. P. 1252–1271, and DEFAMATION.

Slaughtering horses. See CRUELTY to ANIMALS.

Slavery, that civil relation in which one man has absolute power over the life, fortune, and liberty of another. It cannot subsist in England.

> Slaves cannot breathe in England; if their lungs
> Receive our air, that moment they are free:
> They touch our country, and their shackles fall.

In Jeffreys v. Boosey, 3 C. L. Rep. 645, Lord Brougham said:—'It is like the property in human beings, to which I have already adverted alio intuitu. In Somersett's case (11 St. Tr. 340), and the Scotch case of Wedderburn (for both countries have the unfaded honor of having decided this question), it was in vain that the master set up his right to the property in his slave by the law of the country to which he belonged, and called upon our courts to enforce it, as here we are required by this argument to enforce the Austrian common-law copyright. It is sometimes said figuratively that the answer given to the master was: "A slave's fetters fall off the instant he touches British ground." The more literal and homely legal answer was, that our laws are not cognizant of such property as the property alleged; and can give no aid to the enforcement of rights growing out of it.'

The system of colonial slavery was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 73; and see 5 Geo. IV. c. 113; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 98; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 34.

As to Roman slavery, see Sand. Just. 95.

Sledge, a hurdle to draw traitors to execution.—1 Hale P. C. 82.

Slippa, a stirrup.

There is a tenure of land in Cambridgeshire, by holding the sovereign's stirrup.

Slough silver, a rent paid to the castle of Wigmore in lieu of certain days' work in harvest, heretofore reserved to the lord from his tenants.

Small Debts Courts, the several county courts established by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, for the purpose of bringing justice home to every man's door. See COUNTY COURTS.

Small-pox. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 29, intituled 'An Act to extend the Practice of Vaccination (amended by 4 & 5 Vict. c 32),' the guardians of parishes and unions, or the overseers of parishes where there are no guardians, are directed to contract (subject to the regulation of the Poor-law Board) with the medical officers of the union or parish, or other persons, for the vaccination of all persons there resident; and such medical officers or other practitioners shall report to the overseers or guardians, from time to time, the number of persons successfully vaccinated, with such further particulars as the guardians and overseers, under direction of the Poor-law Commissioners, may require; and any person who may produce, or attempt to produce, by inoculation or otherwise, the disease of small-pox in any person in England, Wales, or Ireland, shall be liable to be proceeded against, and convicted summarily before two or more justices of the peace in petty sessions, and for every such offence be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one month. See the Compulsory Vaccination Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 100; amended by 21 Vict. c. 25, s. 7, and by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 59. As to vaccination in Scotland and Ireland, see 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 52 & 108.

Small tithes [otherwise called privy], all personal and mixed tithes, and also hops, flax, saffron, potatoes, and sometimes, by custom, wood.

Smoke-farthings, pentecostals, which see.

Smoke-silver, a modus of 6*d.* in lieu of tithe-wood.

Smuggling, the offence of importing prohibited articles, or of defrauding the revenue by the introduction of articles into consumption, without paying the duties chargeable upon them. It may be committed indifferently either upon the excise or customs revenue.

'To pretend,' says Adam Smith (Wealth of Nations, B. 5, c. ii., pt. 2, art. 4), 'to have any scruple about buying smuggled goods, though a manifest encouragement to the violation of the revenue laws, and to the perjury which almost always attends it, would, in most countries, be regarded as one of those pedantic pieces of hypocrisy which, instead of gaining credit with anybody, seems only to expose the person who affects to practise them to the suspicion of being a greater knave than most of his neighbors. By this indulgence of the public, the smuggler is often encouraged to continue a trade which he is thus taught to consider as, in some measure, innocent; and when the severity of the revenue laws is ready to fall upon him, he is frequently disposed to defend with violence what he has been accustomed to regard as his just property; and from being at first rather imprudent than criminal, he at last too often becomes one of the most determined violators of the laws of society.'

The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 53, was passed to prevent smuggling. See 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 25, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107.

Snottering silver, a small duty paid by servile tenants in Wylegh to the Abbot of Colchester.

Soap, Excise on; repealed by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 39.

Soc, Sok, Soka, jurisdiction; a power or privilege to administer justice and execute laws; also, a shire, circuit, or territory.

Soca, a seignory or lordship, enfranchised by the king, with liberty of holding a court of his soc-men or socagers, i. e. his tenants.

Socage, or Soccage, a tenure by any certain or determinate service.

Socagium idem est quod servitium socæ; et soca, idem est quod caruca.—Co. Litt. 86.—(Socage is the same as service of the soc; and soc is the same thing as a plough.)

Soccager, a tenant by soccage.

Socer [Lat.], the father of one's wife; a father-in-law.

Socialism, absolute equality in the distribution of the physical means of life and enjoyment. It is on the continent employed in a larger sense; not necessarily implying communism, or the entire abolition of private property, but applied to any system which requires that the land and the instruments of production should be the property, not of individuals, but of communities, or associations, or of the government.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 248.

Socida, a contract or hiring, upon condition, that the bailee take upon himself the risk of the loss of the thing hired.—Civ. Law.

Societas leonina, that kind of society or partnership by which the entire profits belong to some of the partners in exclusion of the rest. So called in allusion to the fable of the lion who, having entered into partnership with other animals, for the purpose of hunting, appropriated all the prey to himself. It was void.—Civ. Law. For the several societates, see Sand. Just. 472.

Société anonyme, an association where the liability of all the partners is limited. It had in England until lately no other name than that of 'chartered company,' meaning thereby a joint-stock company whose shareholders, by a charter from the Crown, or a special enactment of the legislature, stood exempted from any liability for the debts of the concern, beyond the amount of their subscriptions. See LIMITED LIABILITY. 2 Mill's Pol. Eco. 485.

Société en commandite. See COMMANDITE.

Society, Benefit Building. The sanction and assistance of the legislature have been granted to societies established to raise a subscription-fund by advances, from which the members shall be enabled to build or purchase dwelling-houses, or to purchase land: such advances being secured to the society by mortgage of the premises so built or purchased.

By 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 32, societies of this description, upon the certificate and deposit of their rules, as required by the Acts relating to friendly societies, are enabled to transfer shares without payment of stamp duty, and to effect reconveyances of the mortgaged property by a mere receipt for the money advanced, without incurring the expense of a formal instrument. See FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Socman, a socager.

Socmanry, free tenure by socage.

Socome, a custom of grinding corn at the lord's mill.

Bond-socome is where the tenants are bound to it.—Blount.

Socua, a privilege, liberty, or franchise.

Sodomy, the crime against nature.—4 Step. Com. 175; Beck's Med. Jurisp. 119; Tayl. Med. Jur. c. 51 ad fin.

Sodomie est crime de Majestie vers le Roy Celeste.—3 Inst. 58.—(Sodomy is treason against the King of Heaven.)

Sodor and Man, Bishopric of, annexed to the province of York by Henry VIII.—33 Hen. VIII. c. 31. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 30, repealing partially 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77. The bishop is not a lord spiritual.

Soit droit fait al partie [Nor.-Fr.] (let right be done to the party).

Sokemanries, lands and tenements which were not held by knight-service, nor by grand serjeanty, nor by petit, but by simple services; being, as it were, lands enfranchised by the king or his predecessors from their ancient demesne. Their tenants were sokemans.

Sokemans, tenants of socage-lands.—3 Bl. Com. 100.

Soke-reeve, the lord's rent gatherer in the soca.

Sold Note. See BOUGHT AND SOLD NOTES.

Soldiers, at parliamentary elections. See 10 & 11 Vict. c. 21, repealing 8 Geo. II. c. 30, and providing that, with certain exceptions, soldiers within two miles shall remain in barracks or quarters during elections.

Soldiers' wills. See NUNCUPATIVE WILLS.

Sole, not married, single, alone, also separate, and apart.

Sole Corporation, one person and his successors, who are incorporated by law, in order to give them some legal capacities and advantages, particularly that of perpetuity, which in their natural persons they could not have had; as the sovereign, a bishop, parson, &c.

Solemnitas intervenire debet in mutatione liberi tenementi, ne contingat donationem deficere pro defectu probationis.—Co. Litt. 48.—(Solemnity ought to intervene in an exchange of free tenement, lest it happen that the gift fail through want of proof.)

Solemnitates juris sunt observandæ.—Jenk. Cent. 13.—(The solemnities of law are to be observed.)

Solent præsides in carcere continendos damnare ut in vinculis contineantur, sed hujus modi interdicta sunt à lege, quia carcer ad continendos, non ad puniendos haberi debet. Cum autem taliter captus, coram justiciarios est producendus, produci non debet ligatis manibus (quamvis interdum gestans compedes propter evasionis periculum), et hoc ideo ne videatur coactus ad aliquam purgationem suscipiendam. 3 Inst. 34.—(It has been a practice to condemn persons confined in prisons to be bound in fetters; but commands of this sort are contrary to law, for a prison is meant as a place of confinement, not of punishment; therefore, when a captive is brought before his judges, his hands should not be fettered (although his feet may be, to prevent his escape); lest, by their being so, it should appear that he was already in a state of punishment.)

Sole tenant [solus tenens, Lat.], he that holds lands by his own right only, without any other person being joined with him.

Solicitation. It is an indictable offence to solicit and incite another to commit a felony, although no felony be in fact committed.—2 East, 5.

Solicitor-General, a law officer of the Crown, appointed by patent, and holding office during the continuance of the ministry of which he is a member, but not of the cabinet. He is usually knighted, and is a member of the House of Commons. He has the care and concern of managing the sovereign's affairs, and has fees for pleading, besides other fees arising by patents, &c. He ranks after the attorney-general.

To the household of a queen-consort, there belongs an officer with this appellation.

Solicitor to the Suitors' Fund, an officer of the Court of Chancery, who is appointed in certain cases guardian ad litem—See Smi. Ch. Pr. 101.

Solicitors, officers of the Court of Chancery, who are retained by clients to sue and defend for them. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127; Smi. Ch. Pr. 42, et seq. As to the admission to the superior courts of solicitors of colonial courts, see 20 & 21 Vict. c. 39.

Solidatum, absolute right or property.

Solidum. To be bound in solido is to be bound for the whole debt jointly and severally with others; but where each is bound for his share, they are said to be bound pro ratâ parte.

Solidus legalis, a coin equal to 13*s.* 4*d.* of the present standard.

Solinus terræ, a ploughland.

Solitary confinement. By 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 90, s. 5, it is provided, that it shall not be lawful for a court to direct that any offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for any longer period than one month at a time, or than three months in the space of one year.

Solo cedit, quicquid solo plantatur.—Office of Exec. 57.—(What is planted in the soil belongs to the soil.)

Sol sine homine generat herbam.—Ibid. 68.—(The sun makes the grass grow without man's assistance.)

Solum rex hoc non facere potest, quod non potest injustè agere.—11 Co. 72.—(This alone the king cannot do, he cannot act unjustly.)

Solus Deus facit hæredem, non homo.—Co. Litt. 5.—(God alone makes the heir, not man.)

Solutio, a discharge; the performance of that to which a person is bound.—Civ. Law.

Solutione feodi militis parliamenti, or Feodi burgensis parliamenti, old writs whereby knights of the shire and burgesses might have recovered their wages or allowance if it had been refused.—35 Hen. VIII. c. 11.

Solutio pretii, emptionis loco habetur.—Jenk. Cent. 56.—(The payment of the price stands in the place of the sale.)

Solvendo esse, to be in a state of solvency, i. e. able to pay.

Solvere pœnas, to pay the penalty.

Solvit ad diem, a plea in an action of debt on bond, &c. that the money was paid at the day appointed.—1 Selw. N. P. 598.

Solvit ante diem, a plea that the money was paid before the day appointed.

Solvit post diem, a plea that the money was paid after the day appointed.—1 Selw. N. P. 598.

Somnambulism. Whether this condition is really anything more than a co-operation of the voluntary muscles with the thoughts which occupy the mind during sleep, is a point very far from being settled by physiologists. Not only is locomotion enjoyed, as the etymology of the term signifies, but the voluntary muscles are capable of executing motions of the most delicate kind.

There is a form of this affection called ecstasis, or cataleptic somnambulism, from its being conjoined with a kind of catalepsy, in which the walking and other active employments are replaced by what appears to be a deep quiet sleep, the patient conversing with fluency and spirit, and exercising the mental faculties with activity and acuteness.

Somnambulism may sometimes incapacitate a person from the proper performance of the duties and engagements of his situation, and then unquestionably it may impair the validity of contracts and other civil acts to which he is a party. By rendering him troublesome, mischievous, and even dangerous, it furnishes good grounds for annulling contracts of service, whether it existed previously and was concealed, or had made its appearance at a later date. Whether it should be considered a sufficient defence of breach of promise of marriage, is a question which does not properly admit of a general answer.

Hoffbauer suggests as a reason for not regarding the criminal actions of the somnambulist with too much indulgence, that they have probably originated, if not in premeditation, at least in the deep and deliberate attention which the mind has given to the subject when awake.

Foderé too, by a somewhat similar kind of logic, comes to the conclusion that the acts of a somnambulist, instead of resulting from mental delusion, are more independent than any others, because they are the free and unconstrained expression of his waking thoughts and designs, and therefore that they are not altogether excusable.

He seems to have forgotten, observes Dr. Ray (Med. Jurisp. of Insanity), that by no human laws are men responsible for their secret thoughts, but only for their words and acts.

Son assault demesne, a justification in an action of assault and battery, on the ground that the plaintiff made the first assault, and what the defendant did was in his own defence. It is a plea by confession and avoidance.—1 Selw. N. P. 32.

Son-in-law [gener, Lat.], the husband of one's daughter.

Sontage, a tax of 40*s.* heretofore laid upon every knight's fee.

Sorcery. No prosecution shall for the future be carried on against any person for witchcraft, sorcery, enchantment, or conjuration, or for charging another with any such offences. Persons pretending to use witchcraft, tell fortunes, or discover stolen goods by skill in any occult or crafty science, are punishable by imprisonment (9 Geo. II. c. 5). Persons using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive the people, are to be deemed rogues and vagabonds, and to be punished with imprisonment and hard labor.—5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 4.

Sorehon, or Sorn, a kind of arbitrary exaction, or servile tenure, which formerly existed in Scotland and Ireland. Whenever a chieftain had a mind to revel, he came down among the tenants with his followers, by way of contempt called Giliwitfitts, and lived on free quarters.

Sororicide, the murder of a sister.

Sors, principal, to distinguish it from interest.

Sothsaga, or Sothsage [fr. soth, true, and saga, Sax., testimony], history.—Cowel.

Soul-scot, a mortuary.

Sounding in damages, an action for unascertained damages.

Sourcar, a merchant or banker; a money-lender.—Indian.

South Sea-fund, the produce of the taxes appropriated to pay the interest of such part of the National Debt as was advanced by the South Sea-Company and its annuitants. The holders of South Sea annuities have been paid off, or have received other stock in lieu thereof.

South Wales, as to the better management and control of the highways in, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 68.

Southwell, the Collegiate Church of, in Nottinghamshire. It is a corporation aggregate, constituted without a head, and consisting only of canons.

Sovereign, a chief or supreme person. See QUEEN. Also, a piece of money of the value of twenty shillings.

Sovereign power, or Sovereignty, that power in a state to which none other is superior.

Sowlegrove, February, so called in South Wales.

Sowne [fr. souvenu, Fr., remembered], such as is leviable.

Sowning and Rowning, the apportioning or placing of cattle on a common, or goods in a house, according to the respective rights of various parties interested.—Scotch phrase.

Spadarius, a sword-bearer.—Blount.

Spado, an eunuch; an impotent man.—Civ. Law.

Sparsim [Lat.], dispersedly.

Spatæ Placitum, a court for the speedy execution of justice upon military delinquents.

Speaker of the House of Commons. This great officer must have been anciently, as at present, the organ or spokesman of the Commons, although in modern times he is more occupied in presiding over the deliberations of the House than in delivering speeches on their behalf. Amongst the duties of the Speaker are the following:—To read to the Sovereign petitions or addresses from the Commons, and to deliver in the royal presence, whether at the palace or in the House of Lords, such speeches as are usually made on behalf of the Commons; to manage, in the name of the House, where counsel, witnesses, or prisoners are at the bar; to reprimand persons who have incurred the displeasure of the House; to issue warrants of commital or release for breaches of privilege; to communicate in writing with any parties, when so instructed by the House; to exercise vigilance in reference to private bills, especially with a view to protect property in general, or the rights of individuals, from undue encroachment or injury; to express the thanks or approbation of the Commons to distinguished personages; to control and regulate the subordinate officers of the House; to entertain the members at dinner, in due succession and at stated periods; to adjourn the House at four o'clock if forty members be not present; to appoint tellers on divisions. The Speaker must abstain from debating, unless in committee of the whole House. As chairman of the House, his duties are the same as those of any other president of a deliberative assembly. When Parliament is about to be prorogued, it is customary for the Speaker to address to the Sovereign, in the House of Lords, a speech recapitulating the proceedings of the session. Should a member persevere in breaches of order, the Speaker may 'name' him, as it is called, a course uniformly followed by the censure of the House. In extreme cases the Speaker may order members or others into custody until the pleasure of the House be signified. On divisions, when the numbers happen to be equal, he gives the casting vote, but he never otherwise votes. He is chosen by the House of Commons from amongst its own members, subject to the approval of the Crown, and holds his office till the dissolution of the Parliament in which he was elected. His salary is 6,000*l.* a-year, exclusive of a furnished residence. At the end of his official labors he is generally rewarded by a peerage, and a pension of 4,000*l.* for two lives. He is a member of the Privy Council, and entitled to rank after barons.—Dod's Parl. Comp. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 84, as to the appointment of a Deputy-Speaker, and the duties he performs during the Speaker's temporary absence.

Speaker of the House of Lords. The Lord Chancellor, by virtue of his office, becomes, on the delivery of the seal to him by the Sovereign, Speaker of the House of Lords. He is usually but not necessarily a peer. There has always been a Deputy-Speaker, and formerly there were two or more, but since the year 1815 there has been only one. The chairman in committees generally fills this office. In the absence of the Lord Chancellor and of the Deputy-Speaker, it is competent to the House to appoint any noble lord to take the woolsack. The Speaker is the organ or mouthpiece of the House, and it therefore is his duty to represent their lordships in their collective capacity, when holding intercourse with other public bodies or with individuals. He has not a casting vote upon divisions, for should the numbers prove equal, the non-contents prevail. The Deputy-Speaker of the Lords is appointed by the Crown. Dod's Parl. Comp.

Speaking demurrer, one in which new facts, which do not appear upon the face of a bill in equity, are introduced to support a demurrer. It will be overruled.

Speaking with prosecutor. It is not uncommon, when a person is convicted of a misdemeanor, more immediately affecting an individual, as a battery, imprisonment, or the like, for the court to permit the defendant to speak with the prosecutor before any judgment is pronounced, and if the prosecutor declare himself satisfied, to inflict but a trivial punishment. This is done in order to reimburse the prosecutor his expenses, and make him some private amends, without the trouble and circuity of a civil action.—4 Step. Com. 315; but see 4 Bl. Com. 364.

Special administration, a limited one, as of certain specific effects, such as a term of years.

Special agent, one authorized to transact only a particular business for his principal, as distinguished from a general agent.

Special bail, bail above or to the action. See BAIL.

Special bailiff, one chosen by a party himself, to execute process in the sheriff's hands; the appointment of such a bailiff relieves the sheriff of all responsibility.

Special bastard, one born of parents before marriage, the parents afterwards intermarrying. By the civil and Scotch law he would be then legitimated.

Special case. Where a difficulty in point of law arises upon a trial, the jury may, instead of finding a special verdict, find a general verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court above, on a special case stated by the counsel on both sides with regard to the matter of law.

The case ought to be dictated by the judge at the trial, and signed by counsel on both sides before the jury are discharged; and if, in settling it, any difference of opinion arise about a fact, the opinion of the jury may be taken, and the fact stated accordingly. In practice, however, after the trial the case is drawn by the junior counsel for the plaintiff, and settled by the junior counsel for the defendant in the same manner as a special verdict, the judge settling any disputes from his notes. The postea is stayed in the hands of the associate until the question is argued and determined, after which a general verdict is entered for the successful party.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 453.

Error may be brought upon a judgment on a special case in the same manner as upon a judgment on a special verdict, unless the parties agree to the contrary; and the proceedings for bringing a special case before the Court of Error shall, as nearly as may be, be the same as in the case of a special verdict; and the Court of Error shall either affirm the judgment or give the same judgment as ought to have been given in the court in which it was originally decided, the said Court of Error being required to draw any inferences of fact from the facts stated in such special case which the court where it was originally decided ought to have drawn.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 32.

By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 25, it shall be lawful for the parties in any action or information after issue joined, by consent, and by order of any of the judges of the superior courts, to state the facts of the case in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, and to agree that a judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff or defendant by confession, or of nolle prosequi, immediately after the decision of the case, or otherwise, as the court may think fit, and judgment shall be entered accordingly.

But the parties may, after writ issued, and before judgment, by consent, and order of a judge, state any question or questions of law in a special case for the opinion of the court, without any pleadings.—C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 46–48; R. H. T. 1853, 15.

Where the parties to an action are agreed as to the question or questions of fact to be decided between them, they may, after writ issued, and before judgment, by consent, and order of a judge (which order any judge shall have power to make, upon being satisfied that the parties have a bonâ fide interest in the decision of such question or questions, and that the same is or are fit to be tried), proceed to the trial of any question or questions of fact without formal pleadings; and such question or questions may be stated for trial in an issue in the form contained in the schedule (A) to the Act annexed, marked No. 6, and such issue may be entered for trial and tried accordingly in the same manner as any issue joined in an ordinary action; and the proceedings in such action and issue shall be under and subject to the ordinary control and jurisdiction of the court, as in other actions.—C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 42–45.

A special case may be stated in an action of ejectment.—C. L. P. A. 1852, ss. 179, 208.

As to a special case in a compulsory arbitration and by arbitrators, see Ibid. 1854, ss. 4, 5.

Where all parties are agreed upon the facts of a matter, but are interested, or claim to be interested, in any question cognizable in the Court of Chancery as to the doubtful construction of any Act of Parliament, will, deed, or other instrument in writing, or any article, clause, matter, or thing therein contained, or as to the title or evidence of title, to any real or personal estate contracted to be sold or otherwise dealt with, or as to the parties to, or the form of any deed or instrument for carrying any such contract into effect, or as to any other matter falling within the original jurisdiction of the court as a Court of Equity, or made subject to the jurisdiction or authority of the court by any statute not being one of the statutes relating to bankrupts, they may concur in stating such question in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court of Chancery, and all executors, administrators, and trustees may concur in such case.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 35; Smi. Ch. Pr. 656.

When at a trial in a court of oyer and terminer, gaol delivery, or quarter sessions, any question of law arises on motion in arrest of judgment (or even independently of such motion), which such court finds too difficult for its determination, it is empowered by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, to reserve the question; and to state it in the form of a special case for the consideration of the judges of the superior courts sitting as a court of criminal appeal; and in the meantime to postpone the judgment, or respite the execution of it, as may be thought fit. As to cases stated by justices of the peace, see 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

Special claim, a claim not enumerated in the orders of 22nd April 1850, which requires the leave of the Court of Chancery to file it.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 645. Claims are abolished. See CLAIM IN EQUITY.

Special commission, an extraordinary commission of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, issued by the Crown to the judges when it is necessary that offences should be immediately tried and punished.

Special constables, persons appointed by the magistrates to execute warrants on particular occasions.—41 Geo. III. c. 78; or to assist in keeping the peace, when the ordinary constables are insufficient for that purpose, see 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 41; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 43; and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 80.

Special damage, a particular loss occasioned by an act complained of.

Special demurrer, a demurrer for some defect in the form of the opposite party's pleading. Abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 51.

Special examiner, one appointed to take examinations in the country.—Smi. Chancery Prac. 27.

Special finding, of a jury, instead of amendment of variance. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 24.

Special indorsement, an indorsement in full on a bill of exchange or promissory note, which, besides the signature of the indorser, expresses in whose favor the indorsement is made. Thus: 'Pay Mr. C. D., or order. A. B.;' the signature of the indorser being subscribed to the direction. Its effect is to make the instrument payable to C. D. or his order only; and accordingly, C. D. cannot transfer it otherwise than by indorsement. The omission of the words, 'or order,' is not material in a special indorsement; for the indorsee takes it with all its incidents, and among the rest with its negotiable quality, if it were originally made payable to order.

Special indorsement on summons. See SUMMONS, WRIT OF.

Special injunctions, those prohibitory writs or interdicts against acts of parties, such as waste, nuisance piracy, &c. See INJUNCTION.

Special jurors' list, a catalogue annually made by a sheriff of persons qualified to act as special jurors.

Special jury, a jury consisting of persons who, in addition to the ordinary qualifications, are of a certain station in society, as esquires, or persons of higher degree, or bankers, or merchants.

The precept issued by the judges of assize shall direct the sheriff to summon a sufficient number of special jurymen, to be mentioned therein, not exceeding forty-eight in all, to try the special jury-causes at the assizes; and the persons summoned in pursuance of such precept shall be the jury for trying the special jury-causes at the assizes, subject to such right of challenge as the parties by law are now entitled to, and a printed panel of the special jurors so summoned shall be made, kept, delivered and annexed to the Nisi-Prius-Record in like time and manner and upon the same terms as is provided with reference to the panel of common jurors; and upon the trial the special jury shall be ballotted for, and called in the order in which they shall be drawn from the box, in the same manner as common jurors: provided that the court or a judge, in such case as they or he may think fit, may order that a special jury be struck according to the late practice, and such order shall be a sufficient warrant for striking such special jury, and making a panel thereof for the trial of the particular cause.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 108.

In any county, except London and Middlesex, the plaintiff in any action, except replevin, shall be entitled to have the cause tried by a special jury, upon giving notice in writing to the defendant, at such time as would be necessary for a notice of trial, of his intention that the cause shall be so tried; and the defendant or plaintiff in replevin shall be so entitled, on giving the like notice within the time now limited for obtaining a rule for a special jury: provided that the court or a judge may at any time order that a cause shall be tried by a special jury, upon such terms as they or he shall think fit (s. 109).

In London and Middlesex special jurors shall be nominated and reduced by and before the under-sheriff and secondary respectively, in like manner as by the master before this Act, upon the application of either party entitled to a special jury, and his obtaining a rule for such purpose, and the names of the jurors so struck shall be placed upon a panel, which shall be delivered and annexed to the Nisis-Prius-Record, in like manner and upon the same terms as is provided with reference to the panel of common jurors; and upon the trial the special jury shall be balloted for, and called in the order in which they shall be drawn from the box, in the same manner as common jurors (s. 110).

Where the defendant in any case, or plaintiff in replevin, gives notice of his intention to try the cause by a special jury, and the venue is in London or Middlesex, the court or a judge if satisfied that such notice is given for the purpose of delay, may order that the cause be tried by a common jury, or make such other order as to the trial of the cause as such court or judge shall think fit (s. 111).

Where notice has been given to try by special jury, either party may, six days before the first day of the sittings in London or Middlesex, or adjournment-day in London, or commission-day of the assizes, give notice to the sheriff that such cause is to be tried by a special jury; and in case no such notice be given, no special jury need be summoned or attend, and the cause may be tried by a common jury, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge (s. 112).

In all cases where notice is not given to the sheriff that the cause is to be tried by a special jury, and by reason thereof a special jury is not summoned or does not attend, the cause may be tried by a common jury, to be taken from the panel of common jurors, in like manner as if no proceedings had been had to try the cause by a special jury (s. 113).

No rule for a special jury shall be granted on behalf of any defendant (or plaintiff in replevin) except on an affidavit, either stating that no notice of trial has been given, or if it has been given, then stating the day for which such notice has been given; and in the latter case no such rule is to be granted unless such application is made for it more than six days before that day; provided that a judge may, on summons, order a rule for a special jury to be drawn up at any time.—H. T. 1853, r. 44.

No cause shall be tried by a special jury in Middlesex or London, unless the rule for such special jury be served and the cause marked in the Associate's book as a special jury-cause, on or before the day preceding the day appointed in Middlesex and London respectively for the trial of special jurors (r. 45).

Sheriffs, other than the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, shall, seven days before the commission-day, make and keep at their offices, for inspection, a printed copy of the panel of the special jurymen to try the special jury causes at the assizes, as directed by the C. L. P. Act, 1852; but such special jury need not be summoned, except notice be given as provided for by the 112th section of the said Act (r. 47). As to the summoning of persons to serve on juries, see 'The Juries' Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 107. See JURY.

Special license, one granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury to authorize a marriage at any convenient time or place.

Special motion. See MOTION.

Special occupancy, where an estate is granted to a man and his heirs during the life of cestui que vie, and the grantee dies without alienation, and while the life for which he held continues, the heir will succeed and is called a special occupant. See 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, ss. 3, 6.

Special paper, a list kept in court of common law in which demurrers, special cases, &c. to be argued are set down.

Special petition. See PETITION.

Special pleaders, members of an inn of court, not called to the bar, who devote themselves to the drawing of common law pleadings.

Special pleading, the science of pleading. It is a forensic invention, due to the dialectic genius of the middle ages, but nearly destroyed by modern innovation. See Step. on Plead.

Special pleas, pleas which are not in the form of what are still called general issues, but which allege affirmative matter, as infancy, coverture, statute of limitations, &c.

Special pleas in bar in criminal matters go to the merits of the indictment, and give a reason why the prisoner ought to be discharged from the prosecution; they are of four kinds, viz. a former acquittal, a former conviction, a former attainder, or a pardon.

Special property, qualified property, which see.

Special sessions. See SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

Special tail, where an estate-tail is limited to the children of two given parents, as to A. and the heirs of his body by B. his wife.

Special traverse, a form of pleading, abolished by C. L. P. A., 1852, s. 65.

Special trust. Where the machinery of a trustee is introduced for the execution of some purpose particularly pointed out, and the trustee is not a mere passive depositary of the estate, but is called upon to exert himself actively in the execution of the settlor's intention; as where a conveyance is to trustees upon trust to sell for payment of debts.

Special trusts have been divided into (1) ministerial (or instrumental), and (2) discretionary. The former, such as demand no further exercise of reason or understanding than every intelligent agent must necessarily employ; the latter, such as cannot be duly administered without the application of a certain degree of prudence and judgment.

Special trusts may be divided, with reference to the object in view, into (1) lawful, and (2) unlawful. The former, such as are directed to some honest purpose, as a trust to pay debts, &c. which are called by Lord Bacon intents, or confidences, and will be administered by the Court of Chancery. The latter are trusts created for the attainment of some end contravening the policy of the law, and therefore not to be sanctioned, as a trust to defraud creditors or to defeat a statute. Such are designated by Lord Bacon frauds, covins, or collusions.—Lew. on Trusts, 21.

Special verdict, a special finding of the facts of the case, leaving to the court the application of the law to the facts thus found. It is dictated by the court, and signed by counsel on both sides, before the jury are discharged.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 430.

Specialty, a contract by deed.

Specialty debts, bonds, mortgages, debts, secured by writing under seal; they rank next to those of record, and above simple contract debts.

Specie, metallic money.

Specification, a particular and detailed account of a thing; also, a description of a patent directed to be enrolled in the High Court of Chancery, within a specified time, its object being to put the public in full possession of the inventor's secret, so that any person may be in a condition to avail himself of it when the period of exclusive privilege has expired.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 115, s. 6. See LETTERS PATENT.

As to indexes of specifications for the public use, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 5, s. 8.

Also, in Scotland, the making of new property from materials belonging to another, as wine from grapes. See Sand. Just. 189.

Specific legacy. See LEGACY.

Specific performance of agreements.

Equity, in obedience to the cardinal rule of natural justice, that a person should perform his agreement, enforces, pursuant to a regulated and judicial discretion, the actual accomplishment of a thing stipulated for, on the ground that what is lawfully agreed to be done ought to be done and indeed is, in its contemplation, considered as now done. The common law has not recognised this principle; it has only given damages to a suffering party for the non-performance of an executory agreement; the C. L. P. A. 1854, has, however, imparted to the Common Law writ of mandamus a little more efficacy. Consult 1 Fonblan. Eq. b. 1; 1 Madd. Chan. 466–563; 2 Atk. Conv. 561–718; Batten on Spec. Perf.; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. c. xviii.; 1 Chit. Eq. Ind. by Mac. 80–110; Dart's Vend. and Pur. c. xviii.; Lord St. Leonard's V. and P. c. v. ss. 3 & 4, p. 168, et seq.; and Fry's Specific Performance of Contracts.

The several requisites of a contract, which will be directed to be specifically executed, are these:—

(a) The contract must be entered into by competent parties, or their lawfully authorized agents. The general rule is, that all parties who can bind themselves at law, are competent to enter into agreements, which equity will enforce.

The instance of supplying a defective execution of a power in favor of meritorious appointees is, however, an exception to this general rule.

The specific performance of a contract will be decreed notwithstanding the infancy of a deceased vendor's heir-at-law, for he is deemed to be a trustee for the purchaser, and the court will grant, in such a case, a vesting order pursuant to 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 30.

(b) The parties must contract willingly, without undue bias, and not under any improper influence.

(c) The terms of the contract must be understood by the parties without mistake or misapprehension, and must be certain and defined, importing a concluded agreement.

(d) The contract must be entered into for a valuable executory consideration, such as marriage or money; and not for a merely good consideration, how meritorious soever it may be.

(e) While a valuable consideration exists on the one side, there must be a promise or sale on the other, together with a mutuality of remedy between the parties. In other words, there must be some inducement passing from one party in order to render binding the promise of the other.

(f) The contract, if it relates to land, should be in writing. The Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 4, enacts that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him thereunto lawfully authorized. It is not, however, considered requisite that an agreement should at the time be binding on both parties, it is sufficient if an agreement signed by one party be afterwards accepted and acted upon by the other. And it is now clearly settled, that a plaintiff may obtain a decree for specific performance of an agreement signed by the defendant alone, for by the party who has not signed the agreement bringing his suit, the court acquires the jurisdiction to bind him by the agreement, and from that moment there is a mutuality of remedy. No particular form of agreement is necessary, for if the written agreement contain a plain and simple statement of the names of the parties, and the terms of the contract, it is sufficient. Thus a contract may be made out by a correspondence, as where one person offers by letter to sell to another property for a given consideration, and the other writes an answer simply accepting such offer, without the introduction of any new term or condition, there being a fair understanding on the part of each as to what is to be the purchase-money, and how it is to be paid, and also a reasonable description of the subject of the bargain. It is not necessary that the contract or writing itself should contain all the terms of the agreement, if it clearly refer to and identify another document which does contain them, so as to make it part and parcel of the agreement.

There must be a signature of the name of the party to be charged, or his agent, in some way so as to give authenticity to the whole agreement, but his surname or initials will be sufficient.

Equity will entertain suits for the specific performance of contracts, which are not reduced into writing, where there does not appear any danger of fraud or perjury. The following parol contracts will, therefore, be specifically enforced:

(1) A sale ordered by a decree of a Court of Chancery, for the judgment of the court in confirming such a purchase, takes the transaction out of the statute. It is, however, now usual for the purchaser to subscribe a written or printed contract.

(2) Where a parol agreement has been so substantially performed in part, as to render it inequitable not to enforce the whole of it.

An agreement will not be considered as partly performed or executed, unless the acts done are such as could be done with no other design than to complete it. Neither will acts merely introductory, or ancillary to an agreement, be considered as part performances, although attended with expense. Therefore, delivering an abstract, giving directions for a conveyance, going to view the estate, appointing an appraiser to value it, making valuations, &c. will not take a parol agreement out of the statute; neither will payment of the purchase-money, because while the Statute of Frauds provides that part payment shall bind in the case of personalty, its silence as to lands is construed to mean that part payment should not have such an effect. But if possession be delivered to the purchaser in part performance, the agreement will be considered as in part executed, especially if he expend money in building on or in improving the property according to the agreement, for the estate will never be so construed as to protect or be a means of fraud. Of course, the terms of the contract must distinctly appear to the satisfaction of the court.

(3) Where the agreement has not been reduced into writing through the fraud of one of the parties, the agreement will be exempted from the operation of the statute, and allowed to be proved by parol evidence.

(4) Another case in which parol agreements are considered binding is when the land is partnership property. Where a partnership, or an agreement in the nature of one, exists between two persons, and land is acquired by the partnership as a substratum of it, the land is in the nature of stock-in-trade of the partnership, and this being proved as an independent fact, the court, without regarding the statute of frauds, will inquire of what the partnership stock consisted, whether that stock be land or any other kind of property.

(5) Where a suit is brought for the execution of a verbal agreement fully set forth in the plaintiff's claim or bill, and the defendant puts in his answer or defence thereto, and confesses the agreement, the case is thereby taken entirely out of the mischief intended to be prevented by the statute, and there being no danger of perjury, the court will decree a specific performance, and should the defendant die, upon an order of revivor against his heir, the same decree will be made as if the ancestor were living. Should, however, the defendant falsely deny the agreement, although he may be indicted for perjury, yet a conviction will not enable equity to decree a performance of the agreement. And where he admits the parol contract, but insists, by way of defence, upon the protection of the statute, the suit will be barred.

The exclusion of parol evidence offered to explain, add to, or vary a written contract relative to land, stands upon two distinct grounds; such evidence is rejected, not simply as being in direct opposition to the Statute of Frauds, but also, independently of the statute upon the general rule of evidence, that a written instrument must speak for itself, and can receive no aid from extrinsic evidence of such an unsatisfactory nature.

The statute does not say that a written agreement shall bind, but that an unwritten agreement shall not bind; leaving it, therefore, to the defendant to make the same defence now as he might have done before the statute; and consequently as before the statute he might have resisted the agreement on parol evidence that it was not what he meant to have entered into, so he may now say the agreement was not that which he meant to have signed.—2 Atk. Conv. 597.

Seeing that the basis of the specific execution of agreements is the inadequacy of the remedy at law by which damages only can be recovered, equity will refuse this relief when such damages would be commensurate with the injury sustained; therefore, as a broad rule, performance of contracts affecting realty will be decreed; but not of contracts for the sale of stock, goods, or other things of a merely personal nature, because the damages which can be recovered at law for their breach will purchase other stock or goods.

Equity has never yet specifically performed the following contracts, viz. common covenants in a lease, the proper remedy being at law; an agreement or covenant to refer a dispute to arbitration, it being contrary to public policy that private tribunals should adjudicate upon matters which ought to be publicly investigated (but an award respecting lands, and not merely for the payment of money, will be ordered to be specifically executed); an agreement to purchase the business of an attorney, for there are not any means of compelling the clients to retain the purchaser; an agreement for a partnership, unless it be for a given period, since it might be dissolved immediately afterwards, and equity does nothing in vain.

To the rule, however, of not decreeing the specific execution of mere personal contracts there are many exceptions; thus, agreements of a negative character, as not to build or not to carry on a trade, or negative covenants in a farming lease, are frequently enforced by injunction. So equity will sometimes secure the performance of a positive agreement by an injunction in a negative form, as to restrain a defendant from keeping possession of books, contrary to express covenant. Again, upon positive agreements as to personal acts, equity has jurisdiction to direct, by a simple mandatory order, those acts to be done which have been agreed to be done; thus the court decrees performance of a covenant for further assurance, should any subsequent right accrue to the person entering into such covenant; and more than this, if there is no such covenant, the court implies an agreement, that any subsequent right acquired by the vendor of an estate shall be conveyed to the purchaser. It may be stated generally, with respect to agreements to do personal acts, and with respect to other agreements, that if damages at law would be an inadequate remedy, and if the act is certain in its nature and capable of being performed, performance will be decreed.

As to the power of the Court of Chancery to award damages, see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27.

Speedy execution. A plaintiff or defendant having obtained a verdict in a cause, is entitled to issue execution in 14 days, unless the judge who tries the cause, or some other judge, or the court, should order execution to issue at an earlier or later period, with or without terms.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 120, and H. T. 1853, r. 57. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 412.

Sperate, that of which there is a hope of the recovery.

Spes est vigilantis somnium.—4 Inst. 203.—(Hope is the dream of one who is awake.)

Spes impunitatis continuum affectum tribuit delinquendi.—3 Inst. 236.—(The hope of impunity confirms the disposition to commit crime.)

Spes recuperandi [Lat.] (the hope of recovery).

Spigurnel [fr. spicurran, Sax., to shut up or inclose], the sealer of the royal writs.

Spinster, an unmarried woman, so called because she was supposed to be occupied in spinning.

In Scotland, the wife's or cognate side of the family is termed the 'spindle-side,' in contradistinction to the agnate or husband's side, which is denominated the 'spear' or 'sword-side.' The armorial bearings of the families of widows and spinsters are painted on this spindle, which is popularly termed a lozenge. Amongst the Romans, the bride at a marriage carried a distaff and spindle with wool, as a type that she was, like a good housewife, to occupy herself in spinning, and in memory of Caia Cæcilia, or Tanaquil, wife of Tarquinius Priscus, a famous spinster. That spinning was eminently the duty of a housewife in the oldest times we learn from the most ancient Greek authors.

Spirits. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 114, the excise regulations relating to the distilling, rectifying, and dealing in spirits are amended and reduced into one Act, and see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 84, s. 2.

As to excise licenses for the sale of spirits, see 6 Geo. IV. cc. 80 & 81, s. 26; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 53; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 51; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 20; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 38; 23 Vict. c. 27; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91.

As to the excise duty on spirits, see 18 &

19 Vict. c. 38 (amended by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91); 23 & 24 Vict. c. 129; and 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 20 & 21.

Spiritual corporations, corporations the members of which are entirely spiritual persons, and incorporated as such, for the furtherance of religion and perpetuating the rights of the church.

They are of two sorts:

(1) Sole, as bishops, certain deans, parsons, and vicars, or

(2) Aggregate, as deans and chapters, prior and convent, abbot and monk.

Spiritual courts, ecclesiastical courts, which see.

Spiritual lords, the archbishops and bishops of the House of Peers.

Spirituality, that which belongs to one as an ecclesiastic.

Spirituality of benefices, the tithes of land, &c.

Spital, or Spittle, a charitable foundation; a hospital for diseased people.

Splitting a cause of action, suing for only a part of a claim or demand. Not permitted.

Spoliation, a writ or suit for the fruits of a church or the church itself, to be sued in the spiritual and not in the temporal court. It lies for one incumbent against another where they both claim by one patron, and the right of patronage does not come in question.—3 Bl. Com. 90.

Spoliatus debet ante omnia restitui.—2 Inst. 714.—(A person who has been despoiled, ought to be restored to his former state before any thing else.)

Sponsalia dicuntur futurarum nuptiarum conventio et repromissio.—Co. Litt. 34.—(A betrothing is the agreement and promise of a future marriage.)

Sponsalia inter minores contracta, ante septem annos, nulla sunt.—Jenk. Cent. 95.—(Betrothings contracted between parties under seven years of age are void.)

Sponsalia, or Stipulatio sponsalitia, espousals; mutual promises to marry.—Civ. Law.

Sponsio judicialis, the feigned issue of the Romans.

Sponsions, agreements or engagements made by certain public officers, as generals or admirals in time of war, either without authority, or in excess of the authority under which they purport to be made.—Inter. Law.

Sponsor, a surety; one who makes a promise or gives security for another.

Sponte oblatâ, a free gift or present to the Crown.

Sponte virum mulier fugiens et adultera facta, Dote sua careat, nisi sponsi sponte retracta.—Co. Litt. 32 b.—(Let a woman leaving her husband of her own accord, and committing adultery, lose her dower, unless taken back by her husband of his own accord.)

Sportula, or Sportella, a dole or largess either of meat or money given by princes or great men to the poor. It was properly the pannier or basket in which the meat was brought, or with which the poor went to beg it, thence the word was transferred to the meat itself, and thence to money sometimes given in lieu of it.—Encyc. Lond.

Spousal, marriage-nuptials.

Spouse-breach, adultery as opposed to simple fornication.

Spreading false news, to make discord between the sovereign and nobility, or concerning any great man of the realm, is a misdemeanor; punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment.

Springing use, contingent use, which see.

Spulzie [fr. spoliatio, Lat.], the taking away or meddling with movables in another's possession, without the consent of the owner or authority of law.—Scotch term.

Spunging-house, a house to which debtors arrested are taken before commitment to prison, where the bailiffs sponge, i. e. impose upon them.

Spurii [either fr. σποράδην, Gk., at hazard, or fr. sine patre, Lat., without a father], children conceived in prostitution.—Sand. Just. 119.

Spy, an enemy who comes to reconnoitre; if caught he is shot.

Squibs. The unlicensed making or selling or exposing to sale fireworks, or the throwing, casting, or firing, squibs or other fireworks in or into any thoroughfare or public place, is an offence punishable by fine. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139 (amended by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 130), and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 98, and may be prosecuted by indictment, either under the statute or at common law. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 52; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25; and also the Squib-case, Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Bl. 892, and 1 Smi. L. C. 343–358.

Squire, contraction of esquire, which see.

S.S. Collar of. Collars studded with the letter S, or consisting of many of that letter linked together, either alone or alternately with other figures, have been at times much worn by persons holding great offices in the state, as well as by the gentry of various ranks, from esquires, upwards. They are still worn (with certain distinctions, which it does not come within our plan to particularise) by the Lords Chief Justices, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Lord Mayor of London, the Kings of Arms, and Heralds, and the Serjeants-at-Arms.

The signification of the letter S in connection with the collar has been variously explained. To name the numerous improbable conjectures that have been formed would be useless. To arrive at any certain conclusion (without further evidence than has as yet been adduced) seems impossible. Perhaps the most likely conjecture is that it stands for Soverayne, the favorite motto of Henry IV. There is ample evidence that the collar of S.S. was originally a badge of the house of Lancaster.—Gent. Mag. for 1842–43.

Stabbing. See 4 Step. Com. 149 & 449.

Stabilia, a writ called by that name, founded on a custom in Normandy that where a man in power claimed lands in the possession of an inferior, he petitioned the prince that it might be put into his hands till the right was decided, whereupon he had this writ.

Stabilitio venationis, the driving deer to a stand.

Stabit præsumptio donec probetur in contrarium.—Hob. 297.—(A presumption will stand good till the contrary is proved.)

Stablestand, one of the four evidences or presumptions whereby a man is convicted to intend the stealing of the royal deer in the forest; and this is when a man is found at his standing in the forest, with a cross-bow bent ready to shoot at any deer, or with a long bow, or else standing close by a tree with greyhounds in a leash ready to slip.—Cowel.

Stade, Stadium, a furlong.

Staff-herding, the following of cattle within a forest.

Stage-coaches. The provisions relative to these will be found embodied in 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 120, amended by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 48; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 66; and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79; and see 10 & 11 Vict. c. 42, s. 2; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 78, ss. 1, 2. As to stage-carriage licenses, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33.

Stagirius, a resident.

Stagnum, a pool. By this name the land and water pass.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Stake, a deposit made to answer an event.

Stakeholder, one with whom a deposit is made by two who lay claim to it.

St. Albans. The borough was disfranchised by 15 Vict. c. 9.

Stale, larceny.—Ang.-Sax.

Stale check, an ante-dated check.

Stale demand, a claim for a long time dormant and undemanded.

Stalking, the going gently, step by step under cover of a horse, &c. to take game.

Stallage, the liberty or right of pitching, or erecting stalls in fairs or markets, or the money paid for the same.

Stallarius, a master of the horse; also the owner of a stall in a market.—Spelm.

Stamp-duties, a branch of the perpetual revenue. They are a tax imposed upon all parchment and paper whereon many legal proceedings or any private instruments are written; and also upon licenses for retailing wines, letting horses to hire, and for numerous other purposes: and upon all newspapers, cards, dice, &c. The principal Stamp Acts are the 55 Geo. III. c. 184; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97; 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 59, 63; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83. See also the following:—60 Geo. III. & 1 Geo. IV. c. 9; 3 & 4 Geo. IV. c. 117; 5 Geo. IV. c. 4; 6 Geo. IV. c. 41; 9 Geo. IV. cc. 18, 49; 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 43; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 22; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 120; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. cc. 23, 97; 4 & 5 *Wm. Standard, that which is of undoubted authority, and the test of other things of the same kind; a settled rate.

Standing mute. See MUTUS.

Standing orders, general regulations to be observed in passing private acts through Parliament.

Stannary [fr. stannum, Lat.; stéan, Cornish tin], a tin-mine.

There are stannary courts in Devonshire and Cornwall for the administration of justice among the tinners therein. They are courts of record of the same limited and exclusive nature as those of the counties palatine. They are held before a judge called the vice-warden, in virtue of a privilege granted to the workers in the tin mines there, to sue and be sued only in their own courts, that they may not be drawn from their business, which is highly profitable to the public, by allowing their law suits in other courts. Error does not lie to the superior courts, but by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 32, s. 26, from all decrees and orders of the vice-warden on the equity side of his court, and from all judgments of the vice-warden on the common-law side thereof, there shall be an appeal to the lord-warden (assisted by two or more assessors, members of the judicial committee of the privy council, or judges of the high court of Chancery, or courts of Common Law at Westminster); and from the lord-warden a final appeal to the judicial committee. See 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 106; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 58; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 83, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 32.

Staple [fr. stapel, Belg. and Sueth.], a settled mart; an established emporium; that which is established in commerce, according to its laws.

Staple, Statute of the, 27 Edw. III. st. 2.—2 Reeves, 393; Bl. Com.

Star [fr. starrum, contr. fr. shetar, Heb., a deed or contract], the deeds, obligations, &c. of the Jews; also a schedule or inventory.

Star Chamber [chambre des estoylles, Fr.], camera stellata, which see.

Stare decisis, to rely upon authorities or cases already adjudicated upon.

Stare in judicio [Lat.], to sue; to litigate in a court.

Starrum, a schedule or inventory.

State-prisoner, one in confinement for a political offence.

State-trial, a trial for a political offence.

Statham. The learning of the law was thrown into a more methodical form than it had ever yet received, by this author, who was a baron of the Exchequer in the time of Edward IV. This was in his Abridgment of the Laws, being a kind of digest, containing most titles of the law, arranged in alphabetical order, and comprising under each head adjudged cases, abridged from the year-books in a concise manner. The plan of this work was entirely new, and conceived with some judgment, though the execution was imperfect, and left open to improvement. The cases are strung together with reference to nothing but the time of their adjudication, without any regard to the connection of their matter. With all its incompleteness, this must have been a very valuable work at the time it was compiled, when the helps to the law were few and confined. This abridgment has served as a model to others in latter times; which, without the merit of originality, have surpassed their master's performance in method, precision, and extent. This work had the fate to be of less use than, perhaps, any performance that, in the nature of it, seemed to aim at such general utility. It is very doubtful whether it was printed before Fitzherbert's Abridgment, which came out in A.D. 1514; and whether it was printed a little before or a little after, the need of it was entirely superseded by the latter work.—4 Reeves, c. xxv., p. 117.

Statics [fr. στατική, Gk.; statique, Fr.], the science which considers the weight of bodies.

Station, a place where ships may ride safely.

Stationarius, stagiarius, which see.

Stationers' Hall. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, authorizes, in every case of copyright, the registration of the title of the proprietor at Stationers' Hall, and provides that, without previous registration, no action shall be commenced, though an omission to register is not otherwise to affect the copyright itself. It was founded A.D. 1553.—2 Hall. Lit. Hist. pt. 2, c. viii., p. 366.

Statism, policy, the arts of government.

Statist, a statesman, a politician, one skilled in government.

Statistic, or Statistical, political.

Statistics, that part of political science which is concerned in collecting and arranging facts illustrative of the condition and resources of a state. The subject is sometimes divided into 1. Historical statistics, or facts which illustrate the former condition of a state. 2. Statistics of population. 3. Of revenue. 4. Of trade, commerce, and navigation. 5. Of the moral, social, and physical condition of the people. See Knight's Cyclopædia.

It has been observed that neither the derivation of this word, the meanings of its collaterals (of statist especially), nor the wants of our language, which has no word comprehending the whole of political science, warrant this restriction.—Encyc. Lond.

Statu liber, a slave made free or enfranchised by testament conditionally.—Civ. Law.

Status, the condition of an individual regarded as a person, the constitutive elements of which were liberty, citizenship and membership in a family.—Civ. Law.

Status de manerio, the assembly of the tenants in the court of the lord of a manor, in order to do their customary suit.

Statuta pro publico commodo latè interpretantur.—Jenk. Cent. 21.—(Statutes made for the public good ought to be liberally construed.)

Statutable, according to statute.

Statutably, in a manner agreeable to law.

Statute, a law, an edict of the legislature, an Act of Parliament. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

The civilians have divided statutes into three classes: personal, real, and mixed. By statutes they mean, not the positive legislation, which in England is known as Acts of Parliament, as contra-distinguished from common law; but the whole municipal law of a particular state, from whatever source arising. Sometimes the word is used by them in contradistinction to the imperial Roman law, which they are accustomed to style, by way of eminence, the common law, since it constitutes the general basis of the jurisprudence of all continental Europe, modified and restrained by local customs and usages, and positive legislation.

Statute-merchant, a bond of record under the hand and seal of the debtor, authenticated by the king's seal, which renders it of so high a nature, that, on failure of payment on the day assigned, execution may be awarded, without any mesne process to summon the debtor, or the trouble or charges of bringing in proofs to convict him, and thus, it is presumed, it obtained the name of a 'pocket judgment.' It has fallen into disuse.—Coote on Mort. 74.

Statute-staple, a bond of record acknowledged before the mayor of the staple, in the presence of the constables of the staples, or one of them, and the only seal required for its validity is the seal of the staple, and therefore if the statute be void for any cause, it cannot, as in the case of a statute-merchant, be proceeded on as a common obligation, and, wanting the sanction of the seal of the king, the sheriff, after the extent, cannot deliver the lands to the conusee, but must seise them into the king's hands; and in order to obtain possession of them, the conusee must sue out a writ of LIBERATE, which is a writ out of Chancery, reciting the former writ, and commanding the sheriff to deliver to the conusee all the lands, tenements, and chattels by him taken into the king's hands, if the conusee will have them, by the extent and appraisement made thereof, until he be satisfied his debt. It has grown obsolete. Coote on Mort. 74.

Statuti, advocates, members of the college.—Civ. Law.

Statuto mercatorio, an ancient writ for imprisoning him who had forfeited a statute-merchant bond, until the debt was satisfied.—Reg. Orig. 146.

Statutory, enacted by statute.

Statutory release, a conveyance which superseded the old compound assurance by lease and release. It was created by the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21, which abolished the lease for a year.

Statuto stapulæ, the ancient writ that lay to take the body to prison, and seize upon the lands and goods of one who had forfeited the bond called statute-staple.—Reg. Orig. 151.

Statutum affirmativum non derogat communi legi.—Jenk. Cent. 24.—(An affirmative statute does not take from the common law.)

Statutum Hiberniæ de cohæredibus, 14 Hen. III. The third public Act in the Statute-book. It has been pronounced not to be a statute. In the form of it, it appears to be an instruction given by the king to his justices in Ireland, directing them how to proceed in a certain point where they entertained a doubt. It seems the justices itinerant in that country had a doubt, when land descended to sisters, whether the younger sisters ought to hold of the eldest, and do homage to her for their several portions, or of the chief lord, and do homage to him; and certain knights had been sent over to know what the practice was in England in such a case.—1 Reeves, 259.

Statutum de mercatoribus, the statute of Acton-Burnell, which see.

Statutum ex gratiâ regis dicitur, quando rex dignatur cedere de jure suo regio, pro commodo et quiete populi sui.—2 Inst. 378.—(A statute is said to be by the grace of the king, when the king deigns to yield some portion of his royal rights for the good and quiet of his people.)

Statutum generaliter est intelligendum quando verba statuti sunt specialia, ratio autem generalis. 10 Co. 101.—(When the words of a statute are special, but the reason of it general, it is to be understood generally.)

Statutum sessionum (the statute-sessions), a meeting in every hundred of constables and householders, by custom, for the ordering of servants, and debating of differences between masters and servants, rating of wages, &c.—5 Eliz. c. 4.

Statutum speciale statuto speciali non derogat. Jenk. Cent. 199.—(One special statute does not take from another special statute.)

Staunforde, the author of the 'Pleas of the Crown,' in the reign of Philip and Mary. This book is written in French; the method of it is perspicuous, and the matter disposed with learning and accuracy. The author is uncommonly full in his quotations, the statutes are generally given at length, and whole pages are frequently transcribed from Bracton. Notwithstanding the alterations which the criminal law underwent since the reign of Henry III., yet Staunforde has ventured perpetually to recur to this ancient writer as an authority, and has taken from him many complete chapters. This is in general done with success and propriety, though sometimes his author has failed him; as, among other instances, may be observed Bracton's definition of larceny, which was not law at the time Staunforde wrote.

In the account which he gives of crimes, his method is to begin by stating what they were in Bracton's time, and then to add the subsequent decisions which had affected the old law. At other times he entirely relies on his favorite author. This is done in a compendious way, without enlarging much on any part of the subject. On the whole, he seems to aim at nothing more than digesting in a clear manner what could be collected from others.

As Staunforde has the praise of being our earliest writer on pleas of the Crown, so has his merit been acknowledged by those who have followed him in the same walk; they having, in general, adhered to the arrangement and divisions of his work. He treats of his subject under three heads: first, of crimes; next, of the method of bringing delinquents to justice; and lastly, of trials and punishment. The several titles into which these are subdivided have furnished the heads of nearly every book which has been written since his time on the same subject.

Bracton seems to have been a great authority with Staunforde; for it appears from the reports, that he ventured to cite and argue from him upon the bench, at a time when it was the fashion to consider Bracton and Glanville, not as authors in our law, but to be quoted, if at all, only for ornament in discourse; and for consonancy and order, when they agreed with better authorities.—4 Reeves, 569.

Stealing. See LARCENY.

Stealing children. See KIDNAPPING.

Stealing heiresses. Where any woman shall have any interest, whether legal or equitable, present or future, absolute, conditional, or contingent, in any real or personal estate; or shall be presumptive-heiress or co-heiress, or presumptive next of kin, or one of the presumptive next of kin to any one having such interest, whosoever shall, from motives of lucre, take away or detain such woman against her will, with intent to marry or carnally know her, or to cause her to be married or carnally known by any other person, and whosoever shall fraudulently allure, take away, or detain such woman, being under the age of twenty-one years, out of the possession of her father or mother or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, with intent to marry or carnally know her, or to cause to be married, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years nor less than three years, or to be imprisoned with or without hard labor for any term not exceeding two years, and whosoever shall be convicted of any offence against this section shall be incapable of taking any estate or interest legal or equitable in any real or personal estate of such woman, &c., and if any such marriage, as aforesaid, shall have taken place, such property shall be settled in such manner as the Court of Chancery in England or Ireland shall upon any information at the suit of the Attorney-General appoint.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 53. If the woman first consent to be taken away, and afterwards refuse to continue with the offender, and he forcibly detain her; or if she be forcibly taken away, and she afterwards consent to her marriage or defilement; or if she be taken away and married with her own consent, obtained by fraud or imposition, it is equally an offence within this statute.

The female, though married, is a competent witness for or against the offender; for though his wife de facto, she is not de jure.

Steam-engines. As to the negligent use of these, see 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 41; and as to damaging them when used for working, &c. mines, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 29.

Steel-bow goods, corn, cattle, straw, and implements of husbandry, let or delivered by a landlord to a tenant, by which the tenant is enabled to stock and work a farm; in consideration of which he becomes bound to return articles, equal in quantity and quality, at the expiration of the lease.—Scotch phrase; 2 Smi. Wealth of Nat. b. 3, c. ii.

Stellionate [stellionatus], a kind of crime which is committed by a deceitful selling of a thing; as if a man should sell as his own estate that which is another's.

In the Roman law, the making a second mortgage without giving notice of the first; but the crime was not committed if the land were equal in value to all the charges upon it.—Dig. 13. See the Clandestine Mortgage Act, 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 16.

Step-daughter [privigna, Lat.] step, i. e. vice, loco, in the place or stead of, e. g. the daughter of one's wife or husband.

Step-father [vitricus, Lat.], the husband of one's mother, who is not one's father.

Step-mother [noverca, Lat.], the wife of one's father, who is not one's mother.

Step-son [privignus, Lat.], the son of one's wife or husband by a former marriage.

Sterbreche, Strebrich, the breaking, obstructing, or straitening of a way.—Termes de la Ley.

Sterling, genuine; having passed the test; money; standard-rate. See EASTERLING.

Stet processus, an order of the court to stay proceedings. Strictly, it can only be made with the consent of the parties; but where the ends of justice will be better answered by this course, it is authoritatively recommended by the court. Each party pays his own costs. As to staying further proceedings in an action, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1363.

Stethe, or Stede, betokeneth properly a bank of a river, and many times a place.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Steuart, the Queen's sheriff within the proper lands of the Crown.—Scotch term.

Stevedore [fr. estivar, Sp., to stow], a person employed to stow a cargo on board a ship.

Steward [seneschallus, Lat.], an officer of chief account within his jurisdiction. See HIGH STEWARD.

Steward of the household. See MARSHALSEA.

Steward of a manor, the lord's deputy, who transacts all the legal and other business connected with the estate, and takes care of the court-rolls. In the royal-manors, the steward is appointed by patent. See 10 Geo. IV. c. 40, s. 14. He may make voluntary grants, which will be valid, notwithstanding any subsequent disability of the person who appointed him.

Should there be joint-stewards, one may act without the other (1 Scriv. 130). In other manors the chief steward is usually appointed by deed, though he may be appointed by parol; but corporations must always appoint by deed under their corporate seal.

The appointment of a steward is generally during the lord's pleasure; it may, however, be for years or for life, forfeitable by abuser, misuser, nonuser, or refuser. The steward's remedy for a disturbance of his office is an action on the case for consequential damages. The Court of Queen's Bench will, upon a proper case made out, grant a writ of mandamus to restore a steward to his office. A steward may depute or authorize another to hold a court; and the acts done in a court so holden will be as legal as if the court had been holden by the chief steward in person. So an under-steward or deputy may authorize another as sub-deputy, pro hâc vice, to hold a court for him, such limited authority not being inconsistent with the rule 'delegatus non potest delegare.'

This deputy, or under-steward, may be appointed either in writing, or by parol, although the appointment of the chief steward do not contain an express authority for that purpose.

Stews, certain brothels anciently permitted in England, suppressed by Henry VIII.

Stickler, an inferior officer who cuts wood within the royal parks of Clarendon; an arbitrator; an obstinate contender about anything.

Stillicidium, the water that falls from the roof of a house in scattered drops.—Civ. Law.

Stint, common without; common sans nombre, i. e. without number. See COMMON.

Stipend, a salary, settled pay; a provision made for the support of the clergy.

As to the payment of curates, see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106.

Stipendiary estates, i. e. feuds, estates granted in return for services, generally of a military kind.

Stipendiary magistrates, paid magistrates. As to these, see 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 9; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 29; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 20; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, ss. 16, 19; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 78; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 97.

Stipendium [fr. stips, a piece of money, and pendo, to weigh, Lat.], wages; pay. Before silver was coined at Rome, the copper money in use was paid by weight, and not by scale.

Stipulated damage, liquidated damage, which see.

Stipulation, bargain; also, a recognizance of certain fidejussors in the nature of bail, taken in the Admiralty courts.

It is the highest and most authentic contract known to the civil law, entered into before the magistrate or public officer, through the medium of interrogatories and answers calculated to explain the nature and extent of the undertaking, to put the parties entering into it on their guard, and to show it to be their mature and deliberate act. It could not be impeached except for fraud or deceit, and could not be released or discharged, except by an equally solemn proceeding, conducted by question and answer before the public functionary, called an acceptilation.—Vinnius, 677; Sand. Just. 431.

Stiremannus, a pilot or steersman.—Domesday.

Stirpes. See PER STIRPES.

Stock, a race, lineage, or family; also, money, capital, or credit; also, the funds, considered merely as perpetual annuities, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government. See FUNDS.

Stockbroker, one who buys and sells stock as the agent of others. The 7 Geo. II. c. 8 (known as Sir John Barnard's Act) requires a stockbroker to keep a book called the broker's book, in which he is to enter all contracts for stock made by him on the same day, with the names of the parties and the day, which book he is to produce when lawfully required. See BROKER.

Stock Certificate Act, 1863, 26 Vict. c. 28. The object of this Act is to give further facilities to the holders of public stocks in respect of the transfer thereof, and the receipt of dividends thereon. It enacts that, with the exception and subject to the conditions therein mentioned, every person inscribed in the books of the Bank of England or of the Bank of Ireland, as proprietor of a share in the public stocks, may obtain a certificate or certificates of title to the said share, or to any part thereof, having annexed coupons entitling the bearer to the dividends payable in respect thereof (s. 3). No trustee of any such share is entitled to such certificate unless authorized by the terms of his trust (s. 4). No certificate shall be granted in respect of any sum of stock not being 50*l.* or a multiple of 50*l.*, or in respect of any larger amount than 1,000*l.* The Treasury may by warrant declare that any one or more of the public stocks specified in the warrant shall be subject to the provisions of this Act; but, until that declaration is made, stock certificates shall be issued only in respect of the 3*l.* per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, Reduced 3*l.* per Cent. Annuities, and the New 3*l.* per Cent. Annuities. The coupons shall contain the dividends payable in respect of the stock described in the certificate for not less than five years from the date of the certificate. At the expiration of that period fresh coupons shall be issued for a further period of five years, and so for successive periods of five years; or in lieu of fresh coupons the Bank may give in exchange a fresh certificate with coupons attached. The coupons are payable at the chief establishment of the Bank at the expiration of three clear days from the day of presentation, and at any branch establishment more than ten miles from the chief establishment, at the expiration of five clear days from the day of presentation. The payment to the bearer of any coupon shall be a full discharge to the Bank. The Bank may grant a new certificate or coupon for one lost or destroyed on receiving an indemnity (s. 5). A stock certificate, unless a name is inscribed therein, shall entitle the bearer to the stock therein described, and shall be transferable by delivery. The bearer of a stock certificate may convert the same into a nominal certificate by inserting therein the name, address, and quality of some person. A stock certificate, when it becomes nominal, shall not be transferable, and the nominee, or some person deriving title from him by devolution in law as in the Act mentioned, shall alone be recognised by the Bank as entitled to the stock described in the certificate. Upon the death of the nominee in a nominal certificate, his personal representative; upon his bankruptcy, his assignees; and upon the marriage of a female nominee, her husband; shall alone be recognised by the Bank as entitled to the stock, &c. (s. 6).

The nominee in a nominal stock certificate shall not be entitled to have the same renewed as nominal, but he shall, on delivery up to the Bank of his certificate, and of all unpaid coupons belonging thereto, and in compliance with any regulation made in pursuance of this Act, be entitled to receive a certificate to bearer. The nominee in a nominal stock certificate, and the bearer of a stock certificate to bearer, may, on the like delivery, &c., require to be registered in the books of the Bank as a holder of the stock described in the certificates under which they derive title, and thereupon the stock shall be re-entered in the books of the Bank, and become transferable, and the dividends payable as if no certificate had been issued (s. 7).

Income tax is to be deducted from coupons (s. 11). Sums due and not demanded on coupons are to be dealt with as unclaimed dividends (s. 12). When a certificate is outstanding, the stock represented thereby shall cease to be transferable in the books of the Bank. The stock described in a certificate shall be deemed to be charged on the same securities, and be subject to the same powers of redemption, &c., as if it had continued registered in the books of the Bank. Stock described in a certificate in respect of which no coupons have been presented for payment for ten years, may be dealt with as if it were stock upon which no dividends had been demanded for ten years (s. 13). The Act provides for the payment of fees, for the making of regulations, and for the punishment of forgery, &c.

Stock Exchange, a society of stockbrokers and stockjobbers. In the transaction of business they are governed by certain usages, and by rules framed by the committee of the Stock Exchange. Also, the place where they meet to transact business.

Stock-in-trade exempted from rating to the relief of the poor by 3 & 4 Vict c. 89, continued by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 44, until October 1, 1862, and thence until the end of the next session. It was not renewed in that session, and has therefore expired.

Stockjobber, a dealer in stock; one who buys and sells stock on his own account.

Stockjobbing Act, 7 Geo. II. c. 8 (made perpetual by 10 Geo. II. c. 8), which was passed to prevent gambling in the funds, enacted, in substance, that all contracts in the nature of wagers relating to the present or future price of stock, or other public securities, should be void, and that the premiums paid on any such contracts should be recoverable back, and as to some of such contracts, rendered persons entering into them liable to a penalty. This Act was repealed by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 28, which in effect put gambling contracts in the funds upon the same footing as other gaming contracts.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 18.

Stocks, prison for the legs.

Stop order, if any person entitled, in expectancy or otherwise, to any share or portion of any stocks or funds, standing in the name of the Accountant-General of the Court to the general credit of any cause, or to the account of any class or classes of persons, assign his interest in such stock or funds, the assignee (although not a party to the cause in which the fund is standing) may present a petition for a stop order to prevent the transfer or payment of such stock or funds, or any part thereof, without notice to him. And a person having a lien on a fund in court may obtain a stop order.

The petition must show generally the title of the assignor to the fund, and his assignment of it to the petitioner, which should be established by affidavit. The assignment, however, is generally proved by the assignor either joining in the petition, or appearing and admitting it. To obviate the cost of proving the deed, it is usual to give to the assignee power to use the name of the assignor, as a co-petitioner.

In all cases, where any stocks or funds are or shall be standing in the name of the Accountant-General to the general credit of any cause, or to the account of any class or classes of persons, and an order is made to prevent the transfer or payment of such stocks or funds, or any part thereof, without notice to the assignee of any person or persons entitled, in expectancy or otherwise, to any share or portion of such stocks or funds, the person or persons by whom any such order shall be obtained, or the shares of such stocks or funds affected by such order, shall, at the discretion of the court, be liable to pay any costs, charges, and expenses, which by reason of any such order having been obtained, shall be occasioned to any party to the cause, or any person interested in any such stocks or funds; and henceforward, any person presenting a petition for any such order, shall not be required to serve such petition upon the parties to the cause, or upon the persons interested in parts of the stocks or funds not sought to be affected by any such order. See Consol. Ord. 1860, xxvi. The assignor, however, must be served with a copy of the petition when it is necessary to prove the assignment.

The order being passed and entered, is delivered at the Accountant-General's office, upon which the payment of the fund is stayed, until the order is discharged, or another order is made directing its payment, notwithstanding the stop order. The person putting on the stop order may appear at the hearing, or upon a petition being presented for the payment of the fund to a party in the cause, who claims it. The stop order will then be either discharged, or payment to the person who has obtained it will be ordered.

When the assignor and assignee concur, the stop order is obtainable at chambers.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 505.

As to the unclaimed stock in the Bank of England, see 56 Geo. III. c. 60, s. 5; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 62.

Stoppage, compensation or set-off.—Civ. Law.

Stoppage in transitu, an unpaid vendor may, in case of the vendee's insolvency, stop the goods sold, in transitu; but this right may be defeated by negotiating the bill of lading with a bonâ fide indorsee. The right of a vendor to stop in transitu is bestowed upon him in order to prevent the injustice which would take place, if, in consequence of the vendee's insolvency, while the price of the goods was yet unpaid, they were to be applied in satisfaction of his liabilities, and so the property of one man were to be disposed of in payment of the debts of another. This stoppage must be considered not as a rescission of the contract, but as merely replacing the vendor in the same position as if he had not parted with the possession; from which it follows that the vendor's right of lien on the part stopped is re-vested and no more. Stoppage in transitu, as its name imports, can only take place while the goods are on their way; if they once arrive at the termination of their journey, and come into the actual or constructive possession of the consignee, there is an end of the vendor's right over them. And, therefore, in most of the cases the dispute has been whether the goods had or had not arrived at the termination of their journey. The rule to be collected from all the cases is, that they are in transitu so long as they are in the hands of the carrier as such, whether he was or was not appointed by the consignee; and, also, so long as they remain in any place of deposit connected with their transmission. But, that, if after their arrival at their place of destination, they be warehoused with the carrier, whose store the vendee uses as his own, or even if they be warehoused with the vendor himself, and rent be paid to him for them, that puts an end to the right to stop in transitu. See Lickbarrow v. Mason, 6 East. 21; 1 Smi. L. C. 595–659; and 2 Selwn. N. P. 1272–1294.

Stores, the supplies of different articles provided for the subsistence and accommodation of a ship's crew and passengers.

It is laid down, in general, that the surplus stores of every ship arriving from parts beyond seas are to be subject to the same duties and regulations as those which affect similar commodities when imported as merchandise; but if it shall appear to the collector and comptroller that the quantity of such stores is not excessive, nor unsuitable, under all the circumstances of the voyage, they may be entered for the private use of the master, purser, or owner of such ship, on payment of the proper duties, or be warehoused for the future use of such ship, although the same could not be legally imported by way of merchandise.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, s. 35.

Stouthrieff, forcible depredation within or near a dwelling-house.—Scotch Law.

Stowage, money paid for a room where goods are laid; housage.

Stowe [Sax.], properly by a bank of a river; a place.—Co. Litt. 4 b. See STETHE.

Stranding, the running of a ship on shore or on a beach.

It is the invariable practice to subjoin the following memorandum to policies of insurance executed by private individuals in this country: 'N.B. Corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed, are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins, are warranted free from average under 5*l.* per cent. and all other goods, also the ship and freight, are warranted free from average under 3*l.* per cent. unless general, or the ship be stranded.'

It is, therefore, of the greatest importance accurately to define what shall be deemed a stranding. But this is no easy matter; and much diversity of opinion has been entertained with respect to it. It would, however, appear that merely striking against a rock, bank, or shore, is not a stranding, and that to constitute it, the ship must be upon the rock, &c. for some time. Mr. Justice Park has the following observations on this subject:—'It is not every touching or striking upon a fixed body in the sea or river that will constitute a stranding. Thus, Lord Ellenborough held that, in order to establish a stranding, the ship must be stationary; for that merely striking on a rock and remaining there a short time (as in the case then at the bar, about a minute and a half), and then passing on, though the vessel may have received some injury, is not a stranding. Lord Ellenborough's language is important. Ex vi termini, stranding means lying on the shore, or something analogous to that. To use a vulgar phrase, which has been applied to this subject, if it be touch and go with the ship, there is no stranding. It cannot be enough that the ship lie for a few minutes on her beam-ends. Every striking must necessarily produce a retardation of the ship's motion. If by the force of the elements she is run aground, and becomes stationary, it is immaterial whether this be upon piles, or the muddy bank of a river, or on rocks, or the sea-shore; but a mere striking will not do, wherever that may happen. I cannot look to the consequences without considering the causa causans. There has been a curiosity in the cases about stranding not creditable to the law. A little common sense may dispose of them more satisfactorily.'—McCull. Comm. Dict.; 2 Selw. N. P. 955.

Stratocracy [fr. στρατός, Gk., an army, and κράτος, power], a military government.

Strator, or Stretward, a surveyor of the highways.

Strict settlement. This limits an estate to the use of the husband for life, remainder to trustees to support contingent remainders, remainder to the wife for life, remainder to other trustees for raising portions for younger children, remainder to the first and other sons in tail-male, remainder to the daughters, as tenants-in-common, with cross-remainders between them, remainder to the husband in fee. The usual course with conveyancers, where property of the wife is settled, is to confer on the wife a power of appointment, in the event of there being no issue, so as to give her the option of defeating the limitations over of her estate. The object of a strict settlement is to put it out of the power of parents to deal with the corpus of an estate to the prejudice of their issue.

Strictissimi juris [Lat.] (of the most strict law).

Strictum jus [Lat.] (mere law in contradiction to equity).

Striking off the roll. Applications are frequently made to strike off the rolls solicitors and attorneys for misconduct. Sometimes, however, they are struck off at their own request.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 144 & 152; and Smi. Ch. Pr. 96.

Strumpet [meretrix, Lat.], a whore, harlot, or courtezan. This word was anciently used for an addition; it occurs to the name of a woman in a return made by a jury in the sixth year of King Henry V.

St. Simonism, an elaborate form of non-communistic socialism. It is a scheme which does not contemplate an equal, but an unequal division of the produce; it does not propose that all should be occupied alike, but differently, according to their vocation or capacity; the function of each being assigned, like grades in a regiment, by the choice of the directing authority, and the remuneration being by salary, proportioned to the importance, in the eyes of that authority, of the function itself, and the merits of the person who fulfils it.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 258.

Stupration [fr. stupro, Lat.], rape, violation.

Stuprum, every union of the sexes forbidden by morality.—Civ. Law.

Sturgeon, a royal fish, which, when either thrown ashore or caught near the coast, is the property of the sovereign.

Sturges Bourne's Act, the Select Vestry Act, 59 Geo. III. c. 12, by which the inhabitants of any parish in vestry assembled, were enabled to commit the management of its poor to a committee of the parishioners appointed for that purpose, and called a select vestry, to whose orders the overseers were bound to conform.

Style, to call, name, or entitle one; also, the title or appellation of a person. See CALENDAR.

Style of Court, the practice observed by a court in its way of proceeding.

Suability, liability to be sued.

Suable, that may be sued.

Sub-agent, an agent of an agent.

Subah, a province such as Bengal. A grand division of a country, which is again divided into circars, chucklas, pergunnahs, and villages. Indian.

Subahdar, the holder of the subah, the governor or viceroy.—Ibid.

Subahdary, the officer or jurisdiction of a subahdar.—Ibid.

Subinfeudation, where the inferior lords, in imitation of their superiors, began to carve out and grant to others minuter estates than their own, to be held of themselves, and were so proceeding downwards in infinitum till stopped by legislative provisions. See TENURE.

Subjects, the members of a commonwealth under a sovereign.

Sublatâ causâ tollitur effectus.—Co. Litt. 303.—(Remove the cause, the effect ceases.)

Sublatâ veneratione magistratuum, respublica ruit.—Jenk. Cent. 48.—(The commonwealth perishes, if the respect for the magistrates be taken away.)

Sublato fundamento cadit opus.—Jenk. Cent. 106.—(Remove the foundation, the superstructure falls.)

Sublato principali tollitur adjunctum.—Co. Litt.—(If the principal is taken away, its adjunct is also taken away.)

Sub-lease, an under-lease.

Sublegerius [fr. sybleger, Sax.], one who is guilty of incestuous whoredom.

Submarshal, an under-marshal.

Submission to arbitration. See ARBITRATION.

Sub modo (under measure or condition).

Subnervare, to ham-string by cutting the sinews of the legs and thighs.

It was an old custom meretrices et impudicas mulieres subnervare.

Sub nomine mulieres continetur quælibet fœmina. Propriè sub nomine mulieris, continetur virgo ; appellatione mulieris in legibus Angliæ continetur uxor, et sic filius natus vel filia nata ex justâ uxore appellatur in legibus Angliæ, filius mulieratus, seu filia mulierata.—Co. Litt. 243.—(Under the word mulieres every woman is included. Properly speaking, under the name of mulier an unmarried woman is included, but in the laws of England, by the title of mulier a wife is included, and so a son or daughter, born of a lawful wife, is called, in the laws of England, filius mulieratus (a son born of a married woman) or filia mulierata (a daughter born of a married woman).)

Subnotation, a rescript, which see.

Subornare est quasi subtus in aure ipsum male ornare, unde subornatio dicitur de falsi expressione, aut de veri suppressione.—3 Inst. 167.—(To suborn is as it were in an underhand manner to adorn oneself by stealth in the ear of another ; whence to express what is false, or suppress what is true, is called subornation.)

Subornation, the crime of procuring another to do a bad action. See PERJURY.

Subpœna [fr. sub, Lat, under, and pœna, penalty], a writ commanding attendance in a court under a penalty. It bears a close analogy to the citation, or vocatio in jus of the civil and canon laws. There are several kinds of subpœna.

At common law there are two to compel the attendance of witnesses :—

(1) Subpœna ad testificandum, the common subpœna, which is personally served upon a witness, in order to compel him to attend the trial or inquiry, to give evidence.

(2) Subpœna duces tecum, this is personally served upon a person, who has in his possession any written instrument, &c. which would be evidence.

These subpœnas are also used in criminal proceedings ; four witnesses can be included in one subpœna, whether in civil or criminal cases.

There are several subpœnas used in the course of a Chancery suit, but only three names can be included in one writ, husband and wife counting as one. They are the following :—

(1) Subpœna ad testificandum.
(2) Subpœna duces tecum.
(3) Subpœna to hear judgment.
(4) Subpœna for costs.
(5) Subpœna served upon an infant on attaining majority, to give him an opportunity to show cause against a decree.
(6) Subpœna to name a solicitor where the solicitor of a party has died, and such party refuses to appoint another.

The subpœna to rejoin is abolished (see Consol. Ord. 1860, xvii. r. 2), and the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 2, abolished the subpœna to appear to and answer a bill.

Subpœna office in Chancery abolished, and its duties transferred to Clerks of Records and Writs.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 28.

Sub pede sigilli [Lat.] (under the foot of the seal).

Subreption, the obtaining a gift from the Crown by concealing what is true.

Subrogation, substitution.

Subsequens matrimonium tollit peccatum præcedens.—Reg. Jur. Civ.—(A subsequent marriage removes a previous criminality.)

Subsequent condition. See CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.

Subsidy, an aid, tax, or tribute granted to the Crown for the urgent occasions of the kingdom, to be levied on every subject of ability, according to the value of his lands or goods.

Substituted Executor, one appointed to act in the place of another executor upon the happening of a certain event, e. g. if the latter should refuse the office.

Substitution, the placing of one under another to transact some business, &c.

In the civil law a conditional appointment of a hæres. For its three kinds, see Cum. C. L. 143 ; Sand. Just. 291.

In the Scotch law, the enumeration or designation of the heirs in a settlement of property ; substitutes in an entail are those heirs who are appointed in succession on failure of others.

Sub-tenant, an under-tenant.

Subtraction, neglecting or refusing to perform any suit, service, custom or duty, or to pay rents, service, tolls, &c.

Suburbani, husbandmen.

Succession, the power or right of coming to the inheritance of ancestors. See CANONS OF INHERITANCE, DISTRIBUTION.

Succession Duties Act. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, which came into operation on the 19th May, 1853.

Successor, one that follows in the place of another.

Succurritur minori ; facilis est lapsus juventutis.—Jenk. Cent. 47.—(A minor is to be assisted : a mistake of youth is easy.)

Sucken, the whole lands astricted to a mill, the tenants of which are bound to grind there.

Sudbury borough disfranchised by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 53.

Sudder, the best ; the fore-court of a house ; the chief seat of government contradistinguished from mofussil, or interior of the country ; the presidency.—Indian.

Sue, to prosecute by law, to claim a civil right by means of legal procedure.

Sufferance, Tenancy at. This is the least and lowest estate which can subsist in realty. It is in strictness not an estate, but a mere possession only. It arises when a person after his right to the occupation, under a lawful title, is at an end, continues (having no title at all) in possession of the land, without the agreement or disagreement of the person in whom the right of possession resides. Thus, if A. is a tenant for years, and his term expires, or is tenant at will, and his lessor dies, and he continues in possession, without the disagreement of the person who is entitled to the same, in the one and the other of these cases he is said to have the possession by sufferance—that is, merely by permission or indulgence, without any right; the law esteeming it just and reasonable, and for the interest of the tenant, and also of the person entitled to the possession, to deem the occupation to be continued by the permission of the person who has the right, till it is proved that the tenant withholds the possession wrongfully, which the law will not presume. As the party came to the possession by right, the law will esteem that right to continue either in point of estate, or by the permission of the owner of the land, till it is proved that the possession is held in opposition to the will of that person.

An under-tenant, who is in possession at the determination of the original lease, and is permitted by the reversioner to hold over, is a quasi tenant at sufferance.

Lord Coke tells us (in 2 Inst. 134) this diversity is to be observed, that where a man cometh to a particular estate by the act of the party, there if he hold over, he is a tenant at sufferance; but where he cómeth to the particular estate by act of law, as a guardian, for instance, there, if he hold over, he is no tenant at sufferance, but an abator. The same doctrine is laid down in 1 Inst. 271.

This tenancy is created only by construction of law, and cannot originate in the agreement of the parties. For the agreement of the parties would pass either an estate at will, or from year to year, according to the interest of the parties. There exists no privity between the tenant at sufferance (who has but a mere possession, without privity) and the person entitled to the possession; yet such occupancy is not adverse to the title of the person who possesses the right of entry, unless he choose to consider it so; but an adverse possession will take place on an entry and perception of the profits of the land by a person, without the reversioner's consent, after the death of a tenant at sufferance. This estate cannot be the subject of conveyance or transfer.

Since laches or neglect can never be imputed to the sovereign, a lessee of crown-lands, holding them over after the determination of his interest in them, is never considered a tenant by sufferance, but he is deemed a bailiff of his own wrong and so accountable to the Crown, but after office found, he becomes an absolute intruder.

This estate is put an end to whenever the true owner actually enters upon the lands, by which he declares the continuance of the tenant tortious and wrongful, or demands possession, or brings his action of ejectment to recover possession, which he may do without any previous demand. Prior to entry, an action of trespass cannot be maintained against the tenant, for his sufferance must be previously determined by entry, before this possessory action will lie.

Sufferance wharves are wharves appointed by the commissioners for the purposes of the customs.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 13.

Sufferentia pacis, a grant or sufferance of peace or truce.

Suffragan. Bishops are styled suffragan, a word signifying deputy in respect of their relation to the archbishop of their province. But formerly each archbishop and bishop had also his suffragan to assist him in conferring orders, and in other spiritual parts of his office within his diocese. These are called suffragan bishops, and resemble the chorepiscopi, or bishops of the country in the early times of the Christian church. How this inferior order of bishops may be elected and consecrated is regulated by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 14.; but notwithstanding this statute, it is not usual to appoint them. They should not be confounded with the coadjutors of a bishop, the latter being appointed, in case of a bishop's infirmity, to superintend his jurisdiction and temporalities, neither of which was within the interference of the former.—Co. Litt. by Harg. 94 (a), note (3).

Suffrage [fr. suffragium, the etymology is uncertain, for the opinions of those who connect it with φράξεσθαι, or fragor, do not deserve notice. Wunder thinks that it may possibly be allied with suffrago, and signified originally an ankle-bone or knuckle-bone], vote; voice given in a controverted point; aid, assistance.

Sugar Duties. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 13; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 67; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 22; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 61; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 84; and 26 Vict. c. 22.

Suggestio falsi [Lat., a representation of untruth], one of the branches of fraud.

Suggestion, a surmise or representing of a thing; an entry of a fact on the record.

Suicide, self-slaughter.

Suicides may be divided into two classes, founded upon the different causes or circumstances by which they are induced. The first includes those who have deliberately committed the act from the force of moral motives alone; the second, those who have been affected with some pathological condition of the brain, excited or not by moral motives.

That suicide is often committed under the impulse of mental derangement, even when mental derangement would not otherwise have been suspected, is a doctrine that was long since taught by some mental writers, and has been confirmed beyond the shadow of a doubt by the researches of mental inquirers.

The suicidal propensity is generally attributed to pathological causes; but there is a large class of cases in which no insanity of mind or body has been observed or suspected, though we have good reason to suspect its existence. Within a few years past, the attention of the medical profession has been directed to this subject; and their researches have abundantly established the fact, that the efficient cause is some pathological change, or physical peculiarity, not in every ease easily defined or understood, but none the less certain on that account.

Among the features which ally the propensity to suicide to ordinary mania, is that of its hereditary disposition. Dr. Gall knew several families in which the suicidal propensity prevailed through several generations. Fabret, whose researches have thrown much light on this affection, believes that it is more disposed to be hereditary than any other kind of insanity.

Another trait which the suicidal propensity possesses in common with some nervous diseases, though not insanity, is its disposition to prevail epidemically, as it were, in consequence of that law of our constitution, not well understood, called sympathy. It is a matter of common observation, that the occurrence of one case of suicide is followed, oftener than not, by one or more in the same community. It is related that thirteen hundred people destroyed themselves in Versailles in 1793; and that in one year, 1506, sixty perished by their own hands in Rouen.—Burrow's Comm. on Insanity, 438.

By the common law, a felo de se forfeits his property, his will becomes void as to personal property, and Christian burial is denied him. 4 Geo. IV. c 52, s. 1. Such severity has been generally avoided, by the almost universal practice of coroners' juries returning an inquest of insanity. In the Court of Probate the suicide of the deceased at or near the time of the execution of the will in dispute is evidence, although by no means conclusive evidence, of insanity.

In Burrows v. Burrows, 1 Hagg. E. R. 109, it was held by Sir John Nicholl, that where there was no evidence of insanity at the time of giving instructions for a will, the commission of suicide three days afterwards did not invalidate the will by raising an inference of previous derangement. In Brookes v. Barret, 7 Pick. 91, C.-J. Parker held that suicide, committed fifteen days after the date of the person's will, was not sufficient, in the absence of other evidence, to prove him insane, and thus invalidate the will, on account of the difficulty of ascertaining with precision the very inception of derangement, which weakens its force in relation to any antecedent act.—Ray's Med. Jurisp. of Insanity, 335; Beck's Med. Jurisp. 561.

Sui juris [Lat.] (of his own right).

Suit, a following. It is used in divers senses:

(1) An action-at-law, or proceeding by bill in Chancery; a prosecution; a petition to a court, &c.

(2) Suit of court, an attendance which a tenant owes to his lord's court.

(3) Suit-covenant, when one has covenanted to do suit and service in his lord's court.

(4) Suit-custom, where service is owed time out of mind.

(5) Suithold, a tenure in consideration of certain services to the superior lord.

(6) The following one in chase, as fresh suit.

Suiter, or Suitor, one that sues; a petitioner; a suppliant; a wooer.

Suitors' fee fund, a fund in the Court of Chancery into which the fees of suitors in that court are paid, and out of which are defrayed the salaries of various officers of that court. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87.

Suitress, a female supplicant.

Suit-silver, a small rent or sum of money paid in some manors to excuse the freeholders' appearance at the courts of their lord.

Sulh Ælmyssan, plough-arms.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Sullery, a plough-land.—1 Inst. 5.

Sumage, toll for carriage on horseback.

Summa charitas est facere justitiam singulis et omni tempore quando necesse fuerit.—11 Co. 70.—(The greatest charity is to do justice to every person, and whenever it may be necessary.)

Summa ratio [lex] est, quæ pro religione facit.—5 Co. 14.—(The highest law is that which supports religion.)

Summary, an abridgement, brief, compendium; also a short application to a court or judge, without the formality of a full proceeding. See PLENARY.

Summer-hus silver, a payment to the lords of the wood on the Wealds of Kent, who used to visit those places in summer, when their under-tenants were bound to prepare little summer-houses for their reception, or else pay a composition in money.—Custom de Sittingburn, M.S.

Summing up evidence. Upon the trial of any cause the addresses to the jury shall be regulated as follows:—The party who begins, or his counsel, shall be allowed, in the event of his opponent not announcing at the close of the case of the party who begins, his intention to adduce evidence, to address the jury a second time at the close of such case, for the purpose of summing-up the evidence; and the party on the other side, or his counsel, shall be allowed to open the case, and also to sum up the evidence (if any); and the right to reply shall be the same as at present.—C. L. P. A. 1854, s. 18.

Summing-up, a judge's charge to a jury.

Summist, one who forms an abridgement.

Summoneas, a writ-judicial of great diversity, according to the divers cases wherein it was used. Obsolete.

Summoners, petty officers who cite and warn persons to appear in any court.—Fleta, l. ix.

Summonitiones aut citationes nullæ liceant fieri intra palatium regis.—3 Inst. 141.—(No summonses or citations are permitted to be served within the king's palace.)

Summonitores Scaccarii, officers who assisted in collecting the revenues by citing the defaulters therein into the Court of Exchequer.

Summons [fr. the writ called summoneas. Pegge's Anecd. of the Engl. Lang. 2nd edit. 173], a call of authority, admonition to appear in court, a citation.

A personal action is commenced by a writ of summons. There are five kinds:—

(1) Where the defendant resides, or is supposed to reside, in this country.

This writ need not set forth any form or cause of action, but it must contain the names of all the defendants, bear date on the day it is issued, and be indorsed with the name and place of abode of the attorney or agent, or plaintiff in person, taking it out. The attorney whose name is endorsed, must, upon a written demand, declare forthwith whether the writ has been issued with his privity, and if so, then he must declare in writing, within a time named in a judge's order, the plaintiff's calling and residence. The proceedings are stayed, if the writ have been issued without such privity.

An endorsement of the debt (if the action be for a debt) and costs on the writ and copy must be made, with a notice that further proceedings will be stayed upon payment within four days. The writ is in force for six calendar months, during which period a concurrent writ, or duplicate original, may be issued, dated on the same day as the original writ, and only to be in force for the same period. A copy of the writ may be served in any county, and the time of service must be endorsed upon the original writ within three days after the service, otherwise the plaintiff cannot proceed in case of non-appearance. The service is personal, but if, upon affidavit, a judge think that reasonable efforts have been made to effect service, and that the defendant knows the writ is issued against him, or that he wilfully evades the service, and has not appeared thereto, then he may order the plaintiff to proceed without personal service upon any terms he pleases.

The distringas to compel an appearance, or to proceed to outlawry on mesne process, is abolished, but the subsequent procedure in outlawry on final process remains the same.

A special endorsement of the particulars of debts or liquidated demands may be made on the writ, which will dispense with any further particulars, unless otherwise ordered; and a mandamus or injunction may also be claimed by indorsement.

(2) In case of an action against British subjects residing abroad, except in Scotland or Ireland, a writ of summons is framed to meet the circumstance, regulating the time for appearance according to the distance of their domicile from England. If service cannot be effected, or the defendant will not appear, a judge at chambers may, upon an affidavit of the facts, permit the plaintiff to proceed to judgment upon terms.

(3) In case of an action against a foreigner residing abroad, another form of a writ of summons should be adopted, and a notice of it served abroad, instead of a copy of the writ, and then the like proceedings may be had as in the instance of a British subject residing abroad.

(4) The Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67), extended to Ireland by 25 Vict. c. 24, provides a form of a writ of summons for an action on a bill of exchange or promissory note commenced within six months after the same shall have become due and payable. The plaintiff upon an affidavit of personal service of such writ, or an order for leave to proceed, can at once sign final judgment, unless the defendant have obtained leave of a judge to appear to such writ within twelve days from such service and defend the action, upon paying into court the sum indorsed on such writ, or upon an affidavit showing a defence upon the merits. The costs are fixed by a General Order, Michaelmas Term, 1855.

(5) A writ of summons against a trader having privilege of Parliament, whereupon proceedings in bankruptcy may be founded, in pursuance of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 77, on filing an affidavit of a sufficient petitioning creditor's debt. If the defendant do not pay or compound such debt, and enter an appearance within one calendar month after the service of the writ, he is deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from such service. See ACT OF BANKRUPTCY. As to writs of summons at common law, see 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 181, et seq.

The writ of summons upon a claim in Chancery is abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 2. As to the summary practice in Chancery on summonses, see Smi. Ch. Pr. 501, et seq. As to summonses and orders at common law in Judges' chambers, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1586, et seq. As to a trader-debtor-summons in bankruptcy, see 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 78. As to summonses and orders in the Court of Probate, see Contentious Rules of 1862; and as to those in the court for divorce and matrimonial causes, see Rules and Orders of 1858; Further Rules and Regulations of 1858.

Summum jus, summa injuria. Summa lex, summa crux.—Hob. 125.—(Extreme law is extreme injury. Strict law is strict punishment.)

Sumner, one who cites or summonses.

Sumptuary laws, those in restraint of luxury, excess in apparel, &c.; they are all repealed by 1 Jac. I. c. 25.—3 Hall, M. A. c. ix., pt. 2, p. 343.

Sunday [fr. sunnan daeg, Sax., the day of the sun], the first day of the week, the Sabbath, the Lord's day, set apart for the service of God, to be kept religiously, and not to be profaned. Wheat. Com. Pr. 185. It is a dies non juridicus, but an arrest for crime can be effected on this day; and bail can arrest their principal, and a serjeant-at-arms can apprehend; but no other law proceedings can be taken. By 29 Car. II. c. 7, it is enacted that 'no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever, shall do or exercise any worldly labor, business or work of their ordinary callings upon the Lord's Day, or any part thereof (works of necessity and charity only excepted).' A contract of hiring and service for a year, between a farmer and a laborer, on a Sunday, is not within the prohibition. A Bill of Exchange drawn on a Sunday is not void. The owner of a stage-coach is not within the statute, nor are railways. See SABBATH.

Sunnud, a prop or support, a patent, charter, or written authority, for holding either land or office.—Indian.

Super altum mare [Lat.] (upon the high sea).

Superannuation Acts, for pensioning the civil servants of the Crown; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 24; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 37; 22 Vict. c. 26; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 89; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 73.

Supercargo, an officer in a ship, whose business is to manage the trade. A person employed by commercial companies or private merchants, to take charge of the cargoes exported, to sell them abroad to the best advantage, and to purchase proper commodities to relade the ship homewards. He goes out and returns home with the ship, thus differing from factors, who have a fixed residence.

Superficiarius, a builder upon another's land under a contract.—Civ. Law.

Superficias, the alienation by the owner of the surface of the soil of all rights necessary for building on the surface, a yearly rent being generally reserved; also a building or erection.—Sand. Just. 226.

Super fidem chartarum, mortuis testibus, erit ad patriam de necessitate recurrendum.—Co. Litt. 6.—(The truth of charters is necessarily to be referred to a jury, when the witnesses are dead.)

Superfœtation, the conception of a second embryo during the gestation of one already conceived, so that the two children may be born at the same or at different times. Its bearing in legal medicine is on the question of legitimacy.

Should the doctrine of superfœtation ever be pleaded in medico-legal cases, the laws of legitimacy must be the guide, both as to premature and protracted births. The latest born should fall within the legal term, or be excluded from the privileges attendant on it; and this is more particularly necessary from the obscurity that invests the subject.

This phenomenon is generally thought by the faculty to be impossible. It has been suggested that one conception may follow another within a short period, and that twins may be the result of two distinct conceptions; and this has been denominated super-conception; but it is hardly probable, say the opponents of this doctrine, that a second conception should take place when a prior conception has already arrived at the second month. It is not uncommon in the case of twins that one should be born prematurely, and the other go on to its full period. See further on this subject, Beck's Med. Jurisp. 158; Taylor's Med. Jurisp. c. 50; and Guy's Forensic Med. 87.

Superflua non nocent.—Jenk. Cent. 184.—(Superfluities hurt not.)

Super-institution, the institution of one in an office to which another has been previously instituted; as where A. is admitted and instituted to a benefice upon one title, and B. is admitted and instituted on the title or presentment of another.—2 Cro. 463.

A church being full by institution, if a second institution is granted to the same church, this is a super-institution; concerning which two things have been resolved:—(1) that the super-institution, as such, is properly triable in the spiritual court; (2) that it is not triable there, in case induction has been given upon the first institution.

The advantage of a super-institution is, that it enables the party who obtains it to try his title by ejectment, without putting him to his quare impedit; but many inconveniences thence following (e. g. the uncertainty to whom tithes shall be paid, and the like), this method has been discouraged.—Mire. on Ad. 189.

Superintendent Registrar, an officer who superintends the registrars of births, deaths, and marriages. There is a superintendent registrar in every poor law union in England and Wales. The office is filled as of right by the clerk to the guardians of the union, if he is duly qualified, and accepts it. These superintending registrars are under the authority of the Registrar-General. See 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86; and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 25.—3 Step. Com. 344.

Superintendents of the China trade. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 93, the Crown had authority to appoint three officers called superintendents, to whom was to be committed the regulation of British trade and commerce to and from this country; and to create a court of justice, with criminal and Admiralty jurisdiction for the trial of offences committed by the subjects of the realm in China. Since this Act we have acquired the island of Hong Kong, and established a legislative council there; and appointed as governor of the island the officer invested with the office of chief superintendent; and it was enacted by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 80, that it should be lawful for Her Majesty by commission to authorize such superintendent, so long as he should be governor of Hong Kong, to enact, with the advice of the said legislative council, all such laws as might be necessary for the good government of British subjects in China, or within any ship not more than 100 miles from China; and to enforce the execution of such laws by pains and penalties. The same power is also given to Her Majesty in Council. See also 22 & 23 Vict. c. 9.

Superintending Constables, those who have the charge of lock-up houses, &c.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 20, s. 6.

Superior, the grantor of a feudal right to be held of himself.

Superior Courts, the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, at Westminster. See these courts treated of under the proper titles.

Super-jurare, a term anciently used when a criminal endeavoured to excuse himself by his own oath, or the oath of one or two witnesses, and the crime objected against him was so plain and notorious that he was convicted on the oaths of many more witnesses.

Supernumerarii, advocates not members of the college.—Civ. Law.

Superoneratione pasturæ, a judicial writ that lay against him who was impleaded in the county-court for the surcharge of a common with his cattle, in a case where he was formerly impleaded for it in the same court, and the cause was removed into one of the superior courts. Obsolete.

Super prærogativâ regis, a writ which formerly lay against the king's tenant's widow for marrying without the royal license.—F. N. B. 174.

Supersedeas, a writ that lies in a great many cases; and signifies in general a command, on good cause shown, to stay some ordinary proceedings which ought otherwise to proceed.—F. N. B. 236.

Supersedere, a private agreement among creditors to supersede proceedings against the person of a bankrupt or other debtor.—Scotch term.

Super statuto, 1 Edw. III. c. 12, a writ that lay against the king's tenant holding in chief, who aliened the king's land without his license.

Super statuto de articulis cleri, a writ which lay against a sheriff or other officer who distrained in the king's highway, or on lands anciently belonging to the church.

Super statuto facto pour seneschal et marshal de roy, &c., a writ which lay against a steward or marshal for holding plea in his court, or for trespass or contracts not made or arising within the king's household.

Super statuto versus servantes et laboratores, a writ which lay against him who kept any servants who had left the service of another contrary to law.

Superstitious uses. See CHARITIES.

Supervisor, a surveyor or overseer.

Super visum corporis [Lat.] (upon view of the corpse).

Supplemental answer, one filed in Chancery for the purpose of correcting, adding to, and explaining an answer already filed.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 334.

Supplemental bill, an addition to an original bill in equity, in order to supply some defect in its original frame and structure. Facts occurring subsequently to the filing of an original bill may be added by amendment or supplemental statement.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 53; Consol Ord. 1860, xxxii., r. 2; Smi. Ch. Pr. 737.

Supplemental bill, bill in the nature of a. This bill and the above-named bill are usually confounded together; but a prominent distinction between them seems to be that a supplemental bill is properly applicable to such cases only where the same parties and the same interests remain before the court; whereas an original bill, in the nature of a supplemental bill, is properly applicable, when new parties with new interests, arising from events which have happened since the institution of the suit, are brought before the court.—Story's Eq. Plead. 265.

Supplemental claim, a further claim which is filed when further relief is sought after the bringing of a claim.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 655.

Supplement, Letters of, where a person is sued before an inferior court, and does not reside within its jurisdiction, these letters are obtained on a warrant from the Court of Session, and in these he may be cited to appear before the inferior judge.—Scotch law.

Suppletory oath, the oath of a litigant party in the spiritual and civil-law courts.

Supplicavit, a writ issuing out of Chancery for taking surety of the peace, upon articles filed on oath, when one is in danger of being hurt in his body by another; it is addressed to the justices of the peace and sheriff of the county, and is grounded upon the 1 Edw. III. st. 2, c. 16, which ordains that certain persons shall be appointed by the chancellor to take care of the peace, &c.—F. N. B. 80.

This writ is seldom used, for when application is made to the superior courts, they usually take the recognizances there, under the 21 Jac. I. c. 8.

Supplicium, any corporal punishment; it included death.—Civ. Law.

Supplies, aids, subsidies, taxes.

Supply, Commissioners of, persons appointed to levy the land-tax in Scotland.

Supply, Committee of. All bills which relate to the public income or expenditure must originate with the House of Commons, and all bills authorizing expenditure of the public money are based upon resolutions moved in a Committee of Supply, which is always a committee of the whole House. The practise with regard to these bills is as follows:—In the course of the session estimates are submitted to a Committee of Supply, and resolutions moved therein granting to the Crown the sums requisite for defraying the expenses attendant on the various branches of the public service. Those resolutions having been considered and disposed of, such amongst them as may be affirmed are reported to the House, reconsidered, and adopted, or rejected. Under authority of those to which the House agree, the Lords of the Treasury issue the requisite funds for carrying on the service of the country. At the end of the session the supply resolutions are consolidated in the Appropriation Bill, which is sent up to the Lords, and after being there considered and agreed to, receives the royal assent and becomes law. The Lords may reject this or any other money-bill, but it would be considered an invasion of the privileges of the Commons if their Lordships were substantially to modify measures of this class; the Commons, however, do not object to consider any verbal emendations which may be made by the other House.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Suppressio veri [Lat.] (a suppression of truth), one of the classes of fraud.

Supra protest (subsequently to protest). See ACCEPTANCE.

Supremacy, sovereign dominion, authority, and pre-eminence.

Supremacy, Act of, 1 Eliz. c. 1.

Supremacy, Oath of, taken by all public officers, &c. whereby they swear to uphold the supreme power of the kingdom in the person of the reigning sovereign. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, and 22 Vict. c. 10.

Suprema potestas seipsam dissolvere potest.—Bacon. — (Supreme power can dissolve itself.)

Supreme power, the highest authority in a state, all other powers in it being inferior thereto. See 2 Ruth. Nat. Laws, b. 2, c. iv., p. 67.

Surcharge, an overcharge of what is just and right; exceeding one's powers or privileges; also a second or further mortgage.

Surcharge and falsify, a mode of taking accounts in Chancery.

A surcharge is applied to the balance of the whole account, and supposes credits to be omitted which ought to be allowed. A falsification applies to a wrong charge in the debits, and supposes that the item is wholly, or in some part, false or erroneous.—2 Ves. 265.

Sur cui in vitâ. See CUI IN VITÂ.

Sur disclaimer, Writ of right of, abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Surety, hostage bondsman, one that gives security for another, one that is bound for another. A surety who discharges the liability of the principal debtor is entitled to an assignment of all the securities held by the creditor.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 5. See SECURITY.

Surgeon [corrupted fr. chirurgeon], one who practises the healing art. See MEDICAL ACT.

The Royal College of Surgeons in England was incorporated by 7 Vict. 14th Sept.

Surgeon of the Queen's Prison, appointed by the Home Secretary during pleasure.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 22.

Surname [fr. surnom, Fr. It is a great dispute whether we should write surname or sirname; on the one hand there are a thousand instances in court rolls and other ancient muniments, where the description of the person is written over the Christian name, this only being inserted in the line; and the French always write surnom. There is, however, no impropriety to say sirname, since these additions are so apparently taken from our sires or fathers], the family name; the name over and above the Christian name.—Encyc. Lond.

Surplice fees, fees payable on ministerial offices of the Church, such as baptisms, funerals, marriages, &c.

Surplusagium non nocet.—9 H. 626.—(Surplusage hurts not.)

Surplus, Surplusage, a supernumerary part, an overplus, what remains when everything is satisfied.

Surrebutter, a plaintiff's answer to a defendant's rebutter.

Surrejoinder, an answer to a rejoinder.

Surrender [fr. sursum redditio], an assurance restoring or yielding up an estate, the operative verbs being 'surrender and yield up.' It is either implied in law, which sometimes construes as a surrender an act done with another intent, ex. gra. the creation of an estate incompatible with an existing estate; or expressed by deed. A surrender in writing of any realty, not being copyhold, and not being an instrument which might have been legally created without writing, is now void at law, unless made by deed.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 3.

The effect of a surrender is to pass and merge the estate of the surrenderor to, and into that of, the surrenderee.

The incidents of a good deed of surrender are:—(1) An able surrenderor, a capable surrenderee, and an actual vested estate in the surrenderor. (2) That it be made to an immediate expectant, solely seised without any intervenient estate. (3) A privity of estate between the parties; and (4) That the surrenderee's estate be capable of sustaining a merger.—Touch. c. xvii., p. 300.

Surrender of copyholds. Copyholds are not, as a general rule, alienable by any of the common law assurances. A surrender (which is vocabulum artis) is the yielding up of a legal tenancy in a copyhold estate, either by express words or operation of law, by the tenant after admittance, or by his lawfully appointed attorney, either in or out of court, to the lord of the manor in person, his chief steward or under-steward; or, by special custom to the bailiff, beadle, or reeve, or to certain tenants of the manor, either as a relinquishment or resignation of such estate, or as the medium of conveying or transferring it to another. Surrenders are made in various forms; in some manors by a rod, in others by a straw, in others by a glove, or some other symbol, which is delivered by the surrenderor to the steward, or other person taking the surrender in the name of seisin. When a copyholder surrenders for a valuable consideration, the land is bound both at law and in equity, and he is prevented from surrendering to any other person, but the whole legal estate remains in him, and he has a right to retain the possession, subject to his accounting for the mesne profits, should the surrenderee be afterwards admitted, and if the surrenderor die, the estate devolves upon his customary heir, but he is a trustee for the surrenderee. A surrender is not affected by the death of any of the parties to it, and the transfer may notwithstanding be completed.

Surrenders of copyholds are governed by the same rules as common law conveyances.

An equitable interest in copyholds is not the subject of surrender, except in the instance of a surrender for the purpose of barring an entail, but it is assignable. The assignee of an equitable estate, on taking a surrender from the person in whom the legal copyhold interest is vested, may compel an admission upon the payment of a single fine.

Surrender of fugitives. Penal laws of foreign countries are strictly local, and affect nothing more than they can reach, and can be seized by virtue of their authority. A fugitive who passes hither comes with all his transitory rights. He may recover money held for his use, and stock, obligations, and the like; and cannot be affected in this country by proceedings against him in that which he has left, beyond the limits of which such proceedings do not extend. Per Lord Loughborough, Folliott v. Ogden, 1 H. Bl. 135.' Mr. Justice Buller, in the same case (3 T. R. 733), on a writ of error, said:—'It is a general principle that the penal laws of one country cannot be taken notice of in another.' The same doctrine was affirmed by Lord Ellenborough in a subsequent case, Wolff v. Oxholm, 6 M. & Selw. 99. And it has been promulgated by Lord Brougham, in very clear and authoritative terms:—'The lex loci must needs govern all criminal jurisdiction, from the nature of the thing and the purpose of the jurisdiction.'—Warrender v. Warrender, 9 Bligh, 119.

The same doctrine as to Scotland is stated by Lord Kaimes:—'There is not,' says he, 'the same necessity for an extraordinary jurisdiction to punish foreign delinquencies. The proper place for punishment is where the crime is committed. And no society takes concern in any crime but what is hurtful to itself.'—Kaimes on Equity, b. 3, c. viii.

Pardessus has affirmed a similar principle:—'In all the states of Christendom,' says he, 'by a sort of general consent and uniformity of practice, the prosecution and punishment of penal offences are left to the tribunals of the country where they are committed. The principle of the French legislation, that the laws of police and bail are obligatory upon all who are within the territory, is a principle of common right in all nations.'—Droit Com. 5 art. 1467.

There is another point which has been a good deal discussed of late; and that is, whether a nation is bound to surrender up fugitives from justice who escape into its territories and seek there an asylum from punishment. The practice has, beyond question, prevailed as a matter of comity, and sometimes of treaty, between some neighboring states, and sometimes also between distant states having much intercourse with each other. Paul Voet remarks that, under the Roman Empire, this right of having a criminal remitted for trial to the proper forum criminis was unquestionable. But he remarks that, according to the custom of almost all Christendom (except Saxony), the remitter of criminals, except in cases of humanity, is not admitted; and when done, it is to be upon letters rogatory, so that there may be no prejudice to the local jurisdiction. As quoted by Story, Confl. of Laws, 878.

It has, however, been treated by other distinguished jurists as a strict right, and as constituting a part of the law and usage of nations, that offenders charged with a high crime, who have fled from the country in which the crime has been committed, should be delivered up and sent back for trial by the sovereign of the country where they are found. Vattel manifestly contemplates the subject in this latter view, contending that it is the duty of the government where the criminal is, to deliver him up, or to punish him; and if it refuse so to do, then it becomes responsible as, in some measure, an accomplice in the crime. This opinion is also maintained with great vigour by Grotius, by Heineccius, by Burlemaqui, and by Rutherforth. There is no inconsiderable weight of common law authority on the same side; and Mr. Chancellor Kent has adopted the doctrine in a case which called directly for its decision.

On the other hand, Puffendorf explicitly denies it as a matter of right; Martens is manifestly of the same opinion, contending that with respect to crimes committed out of his territories, no sovereign is obliged to punish the criminal who seeks shelter in his dominions, or to execute a sentence pronounced against his person or his property. Lord Coke especially maintains, that the sovereign is not bound to surrender up fugitive criminals from other countries who have sought a shelter in his dominions. Consult Story's Confl. of Laws, 874. See EXTRADITION.

Surrenderee, a person to whom a surrender is made.

Surrenderor, a person who surrenders.

Surreptitious, in a fraudulent, stealthy manner.

Surrogate, one that is substituted or appointed in the room of another, as by a bishop, chancellor, judge, &c.

Sursise, to forbear or neglect.—Bract. l. 5.

Sursumredditio [Lat.], a surrender, a redition.

Surveyor, one who has the overseeing or care of another person's lands or works. See HIGHWAYS. As to county surveyors in Ireland, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 106.

A court of surveyors was erected by 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, for the benefit of the Crown.

Survivorship, the living of one of two or more persons after the death of the other or others. See PRESUMPTION OF SURVIVORSHIP.

Suspense, Suspension, a temporal stop or hanging up as it were of a right for a time; also a censure on ecclesiastical persons, during which they are forbidden to exercise their offices, or take the profits of their benefices.

Suspension, Pleas in, those which show some matter of temporary incapacity to proceed with the action or suit.

Sus. per coll. On the trial of criminals, the usage is for the judge to sign the calendar or list of all the prisoners' names, with their separate judgments in the margin, which is left with the sheriff. In the case of a capital felony, it is written opposite to the prisoner's name, 'Hanged by the neck;' formerly in the days of Latin and abbreviation, sus. per coll. for suspendatur per collum.—4 Bl. Com. c. xxxii.

Suthdure, the south-door of a church, where canonical purgation was performed, and plaints, &c. were heard and determined.

Swarf-money, warth-money or guard-money, paid in lieu of the service of castle-ward.

Swearing, the act of declaring upon oath. Profane swearing and cursing is an offence against God and religion, punishable summarily by fine.—19 Geo. II. c. 21.

Swearing the peace, showing to a judge that one has just cause to be afraid of another in consequence of his menaces or attempts, in order to get him bound to keep the peace.

Sweinmote, Court of, one of the forest-courts, which is to be holden before the verderors as judges, by the steward, thrice in every year, the sweins or feeholders within the forest composing the jury. The principal jurisdiction of this court is first to inquire into the oppressions and grievances committed by the officers of the forest; and secondly, to receive and try presentments certified from the court of attachments, against offenders in vert and venison. And this court may not only inquire but convict also, which conviction shall be certified to the court of justice-seat under the seals of the jury; for this court cannot proceed to judgment.—4 Inst. 289.

Swindler, a cheat; one who lives by cheating.

Swoling of land, so much land as one's plough can till in a year; a hide of land.

Sworn brothers [fratres jurati, Lat.], persons who, by mutual oaths, covenant to share in each other's fortunes.

Sworn clerks in Chancery. These offices are abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Syb and Som, peace and security.

Sycophants, malicious informers.

Sylva cædua [subbois, Fr.] wood under twenty years' growth.

Symbolic delivery. See LIVERY OF SEISIN.

Symbolæography, the art or cunning rightly to form and make written instruments. It is either judicial or extra-judicial; the latter being wholly occupied with such instruments as concern matters not yet judicially in controversy, such as instruments of agreement or contracts, and testaments or last wills.

Symbolum animæ [Lat.], a mortuary, of soul-scot.

Synallagmatical, that which involves mutual and reciprocal obligations and duties.

Syncopare, to cut short, or pronounce things so as not to be understood.—Cowel.

Syndic, an advocate or patron; a burgess or recorder; an agent or attorney who acts for a corporation or university; an actor or procurator, an assignee.—Civ. Law. See in the goods of Eliz. Darke (deceased), 29 L. J. (Prob. M. & A.) 71 (1860).

Syngraph, a deed, bond, or writing, under the hands and seals of all the parties.—Civ. Law.

Synod, a meeting or assembly of ecclesiastical persons concerning religion; being the same thing, in Greek, as convocation in Latin.

There are four kinds:—

(1) A general or universal synod or council, where bishops of all nations meet.

(2) A national synod of the clergy of one nation only.

(3) A provincial synod, where ecclesiastical persons of a province only assemble, being now what is called the convocation.

(4) A diocesan synod, of those of one diocese.

A synod in Scotland is composed of three or more presbyteries.

Synodal, a tribute or payment in money paid to the bishop or archdeacon by the inferior clergy, at Easter visitation.

Synodales testes, synods-men, corrupted into sidesmen, were the urban and rural deans, now the churchwardens. See SIDESMEN.

T.

T, every person who was convicted of felony, short of murder, and admitted to the benefit of clergy, was marked with this letter upon the brawn of the thumb. The practice is abolished. 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

Tabard [fr. tabar, Wel.; tabardum, low Lat.], a short gown; a herald's coat; a surcoat.

Tabarder, one who wears a tabard or short gown; the name is still used as the title of certain bachelors of arts on the old foundation of Queen's College, Oxford.—Encyc. Lond.

Tabellio, a Roman officer who reduced contracts and wills into proper form, and attested their execution.

Table rents, payments to bishops, &c., reserved and appropriated to their table or housekeeping.

Tabula in naufragio [Lat.] (a plank in a wreck). See TACKING and ATTENDANT TERM.

Tabulæ nuptiales, a written record of a marriage; or the agreement as to the dos.—Civ. Law.

Tabularius, a notary.—Civ. Law.

Tac free, exempt from rent, payments, &c. Tacita quædam habentur pro expressis.—8 Co. 40.—(Things unexpressed are sometimes considered as expressed.)

Tacite relocation, a silent or understood re-letting of premises after the expiration of a lease, upon the same terms, &c. as those of such lease.—Scotch phrase.

Tack, a lease or contract of location; also an addition, supplement.

Tack duty, rent reserved upon a lease.

Tacking, the doctrine known by the name of tacking, i. e. consolidating and priorizing two or more claims, applies in two cases; one, as against a mortgagor, the other, as between several incumbrancers.

It being deemed right that a mortgagee should not be deprived of his pledge without payment of all sums of money due to him from his mortgagor, which form a general or specific lien on the property mortgaged, if the mortgagee advance further sums of money to the mortgagor, expressly by way of surchage, or on judgment, or recognizance, neither the mortgagor nor, generally speaking, any one claiming under him, is allowed to redeem without satisfying the whole amount.

A prior mortgagee may tack a subsequent judgment to his mortgage; and a prior judgment creditor, on getting in a subsequent mortgage, may tack to it his judgment, provided he have lent money on the security of such judgment, and it has been duly registered; but probably tacking would not be allowed where the judgment has been obtained for an antecedent debt.—2 Sp. Eq. Juris. 723. A bond debt cannot, although a simple contract debt can, be tacked to a mortgage in fee as against the mortgagor; but it appears that a bond debt can be tacked to a mortgage of leaseholds or personal chattels. See Coote on Mort. 391, et seq. As regards, however, the heir or devisee of the mortgagor, where there is a bond debt or simple contract debt, neither the heir nor the devisee is permitted to redeem without paying both the mortgage and such debt, and that whether the debt precede or follow the mortgage, in order to avoid circuity of action. A mortgagee is entitled, under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, which makes copyhold estates equitable assets for the payment of simple contract debts, to tack his simple contract debt to his mortgage, as against the customary heir, devisee, or executor coming to redeem; but not as against specialty creditors.—Rolfe v. Chester, 20 Bea. 610 (1856); and see Thomas v. Thomas, 22 Bea. 341.

It is a general rule that where there are several encumbrancers on an estate they rank according to their dates, which constitute the order in which they are entitled to be satisfied. It is, however, a maxim in deciding upon equitable claims connected with a legal title, that where the equity of two antagonist parties is equal, he who has the legal title shall prevail; i. e. the equity of a person who has only a title in equity will be postponed to one who has an equal title in equity, and also a title at law. Pursuant to this doctrine, a subsequent mortgagee, without notice of a mesne mortgage when he advanced his money, by purchasing the legal estate from the first legal mortgagee, can protect his estate against any person having a mortgage subsequent to such first incumbrance, and squeeze him out, though he bought it after he had notice of the subsequent mortgage, or even pendente lite, provided he redeems the first mortgage before a decree to settle priorities. This is what Lord Hale called the creditor's tabula in naufragio!—Marsh v. Lee, 2 Vent. 337 (22 Car. II.), and 1 White and Tudor's Lead Cas. 406–414. And notice of his advance, given by the second to the first mortgagee, will not prevent the third mortgagee, who lends his money without notice of it, from tacking his mortgage to the first.

If, however, a prior mortgagee take an assignment of a third mortgage, as a trustee only for another person, or a mortgage of the equity of redemption come to him as executor, he will not be allowed to tack the two mortgages together to the prejudice of intervening incumbrancers; since, if this were permitted, a mere stranger purchasing the third mortgage, by declaring he bought it in trust only for the first mortgagee, might tack both together, and defeat all the other incumbrancers.

If a first mortgagee lend a further sum to the mortgagor upon a statute or judgment, he may retain against a mesne mortgagee (provided he had no notice of such mesne mortgage) till both the mortgage and statute or judgment be paid. See 2 Sp. Eq. 720–752, and the cases there collected and criticised.

Tail [fr. tailler, Fr., to prune]. An estate-tail is a freehold of inheritance, limited to a person and the heirs of his body general or special, male or female, and is the creature of the Statute de Donis. The estate, provided the entail be not barred, reverts to the donor or reversioner, if the donee die without leaving descendants answering to the condition annexed to the estate upon its creation, unless there be a limitation over to a third person on default of such descendants, when it vests in such third person or remainder-man.

In order to create an estate tail by deed, the word 'heir' or 'heirs' must be used.—White v. Collins, Com. Rep. 289, 301; 2 Prest. Est. 475. In addition to this term, the deed must contain, either in direct terms or by reference, words of procreation, to describe the body from whom the heirs are to proceed, or the person by whom they are to be begotten.

In a will technical words of limitation are not necessary: thus a devise

To A. and his issue; or

To A. and his seed; or children; or sons; or

To A. and his heirs male; or

To. A. and his heirs lawfully begotten; or

To A. and if he die before issue, or not having issue, or not having a son, then to another, will give estates-tail. So numerous are the cases on this voluminous subject that they cannot possibly be explained fully in this place. In wills, however, great indulgence is exercised, and if the courts can collect from the language used by a testator, that it was his intention to entail his estate, they will rule accordingly. The plain sense of words is followed by the courts in their exposition of obscurely expressed wills; wresting and torturing language out of its natural signification will not be permitted, for thus to defeat a testator's intention is directly counteracting the injunctions of the law, and 'racking a man upon his deathbed,' remarked Lord C. J. Wilmot, 'to make him say what he never meant or thought of.'

Mr. Hayes observes (2 Conv. 7):—'It is quite unnecessary to add 'lawfully begotten,' or 'lawfully issuing,' or any other expressions of the like import, in order to create an estate-tail even in a deed. It is enough if the word heirs be used, and the person from whom the issue is to proceed be ascertained. In framing limitations to children as purchasers, it is abundantly sufficient to say, 'the children of A.' or 'the children of A. by B.,' or 'the children of the intended marriage.' The vulgar form, 'the children of the body of A., on the body of B., his (A.'s) intended wife, lawfully to be begotten,' seems to be the product of a confused notion of the legal rules relative to the creation of an estate-tail.'

If a tenant-in-tail grant the fee-simple in the property to another person and his heirs, only a qualified or base fee will pass, commensurate with the estate-tail, capable however of being rendered absolute, by barring the entail, but until then defeasible by the entry not only of the reversioner, or remainder-man, when he becomes entitled to enter into possession of the estate, but also of the issue in tail upon the death of the tenant-in-tail. It should be observed that an estate-tail cannot as such be conveyed to another.

This estate possesses the following incidents and privileges:—

(1) It is, like a fee-simple, subject to curtesy and dower (if not barred).

(2) The owner may commit all kinds of waste upon it without being impeachable for it, and so it is said may his grantee.—3 Leon. 121.

(3) It is liable to every kind of debt.

(4) It may be lost by escheat; by forfeiture for treason, or felony; or by extinguishment.

(5) The owner, having an inheritable freehold, has a right to the title-deeds, which equity will secure to him.

(6) Although a tenant-in-tail must generally keep down the interest, yet, having only a particular interest, he is not bound to pay off any charge or incumbrance affecting the estate; if, however, he do so, the presumption is that he meant to exonerate the estate (for he might, if he pleased, have acquired the fee-simple), unless he evince the contrary intention by taking an assignment of the incumbrance to a trustee in trust for himself, or by some other express act.

(7) The donee may grant leases for 21 years out of it, under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, ss. 32 & 33.

(8) This estate cannot be merged, surrendered, or extinguished by the accession of the fee-simple to the tenant-in-tail.

(9) The issue-in-tail is not bound to complete, either at law or in equity, any contract made by his ancestor as tenant-in-tail, since he claims from the original grantor, and not from his immediate ancestor. If, however, he do any act towards completing such a contract, equity will then compel its performance.

(10) Neither is such issue bound to pay off his ancestor's incumbrances, nor to keep down the interest thereon; but he is liable to crown-debts under 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, s. 75.

(11) A tenant-in-tail may cut timber and dispose of it, without barring the entail; but if he sell the growing trees, the buyer must sever them during his life, otherwise the issue in tail will be entitled to them as part of the inheritance; and the buyer, though obliged to pay the purchase-money, will not then be allowed to sever them.

(12) If a tenant-in-tail grant estovers, or the vesture of his woods, to another, the grant determines with his death; for, being a charge upon the inheritance, it necessarily ceases when his power is determined.

(13) It may be barred by the tenant-in-tail, though not by the issue-in-tail, under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74; but the entail of offices or dignities cannot be barred.

Before the Statute de Donis Conditionalibus, the donee could, after issue born, have alienated the land, whereby the issue would have been disinherited, and the donor deprived of his right of reversion. This being the case, the statute declared that the will of the donor should be observed; and that an estate granted to a man and the heirs of his body should descend to the issue (he not having power to alienate the estate), and that in default of issue, the land should revert to the donor or his heirs. Estates-tail were thus made inalienable, and neither the issue nor the remainder-man could be barred. The legislature, by fettering the land with an indestructible entail, which prevented money being raised upon it, cramped the energies of commercial pursuits, and withered the efforts of honorable exertion. And many other inconvenient consequences were produced, which quickened the ingenuity of the judicature, until it produced, at length (in its efforts to recover the liberty of alienation), the complicated machinery of fines and recoveries. See FINE and RECOVERY.

The modes, then, of barring an estate-tail were two, viz. a fine, according to the statute-law (which was a compromise of a fictitious action), giving a base fee commensurate with the existence of the issue upon whom the estate-tail would (if unbarred) have devolved, and a recovery at the common law (which was a real action carried on to judgment), giving the fee-simple absolute. These were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, an analysis of which is here attempted, in consequence of its importance.

The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, is entitled 'An Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and for the substitution of more simple modes of Assurance,' and it received the royal assent Aug. 28th, 1833. The first section contains the following glossary of the terms used in it: The word 'lands' is to extend to 'manors, advowsons, rectories, messuages, lands, tenements, tithes, rents, and hereditaments of any tenure (except copy of court-roll), and whether corporeal or incorporeal, and any undivided share thereof; but when accompanied by some expression, including or denoting the tenure by copy of court-roll, it shall extend to manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments of that tenure, and any undivided share thereof.'

either at law or in equity, and to any interest, charge, lien, or incumbrance in, upon, or affecting money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands.'

'Base-fee' is to mean 'exclusively that estate in fee-simple into which an estate-tail is converted, where the issue-in-tail are barred; but persons claiming estates, by way of remainder or otherwise, are not barred.'

'Estate-tail,' in addition to its usual meaning, is to mean 'a base-fee into which an estate-tail shall have been converted.'

'Actual tenant-in-tail,' is to mean 'exclusively the tenant of an estate-tail which shall not have been barred, and such tenant is to be deemed an actual tenant-in-tail, although an estate-tail may have been divested or turned to a right.'

'Tenant-in-tail' is to mean 'not only an actual tenant-in-tail, but also a person who, where an estate-tail shall have been barred and converted into a base-fee, would have been tenant of such estate-tail if the same had not been barred.'

'Tenant-in-tail entitled to a base-fee' is to mean 'a person entitled to a base-fee, or to the ultimate beneficial interest in a base-fee, and who, if the base-fee had not been created, would have been actual tenant-in-tail.'

'Money subject to be invested in the purchase of land' is to include 'money whether raised or to be raised, and whether the amount thereof be or be not ascertained, and to extend to stocks and funds, and real and other securities, the produce of which is directed to be invested in the purchase of lands, and the lands to be purchased with such money or produce, is to extend to lands held by copy of court-roll, and also to lands of any tenure, in Ireland, or elsewhere out of England, where such lands, or any of them, are within the scope or meaning of the trust or power directing or authorizing the purchase.'

The word 'person' is to include 'a body politic, corporate or collegiate, as well as an individual.'

'Every word importing the singular number only is to extend and be applied to several persons or things, as well as to one person or thing; and every word importing the plural number is to extend and be applied to one person or thing, as well as several persons or things; and every word importing the masculine gender only is to extend and be applied to a female as well as to a male.'

'Every assurance already made or hereafter to be made, whether by deed, will, private Act of Parliament, or otherwise, by which lands are or shall be entailed, or agreed or directed to be entailed, is to be deemed a settlement; and every appointment made in exercise of any power contained in any settlement, or of any other power, arising out of the power contained in any settlement, is to be considered as part of such settlement, and the estate created by such appointment is to be considered as having been created by such settlement.'

This section of definitions concludes with a provision 'that those words and expressions occurring in this clause, to which more than one meaning is to be attached, are not to have the different meanings given to them by this clause, in those cases in which there is anything in the subject or context repugnant to such construction.'

The enactments following (which extend from section 2 to section 14, both inclusive) may be thus briefly stated:—

No fine or recovery is to be levied or suffered, after December 31st, 1833, except a writ of dedimus, or other writ, in the regular course of a fine or recovery, have been sued out before this date; but there is no time named for completing such fine or recovery (s. 2).

Persons under covenants (before the Act came into operation) to levy fines, or suffer recoveries, are to effect such purposes by the means pointed out in this Act; but if such purposes cannot be so effected, then by a special deed, which shall have the same operation as a fine or recovery (s. 3).

Fines and recoveries of lands in ancient demesne, when levied or suffered in a superior court, may be reversed, as to the lord, by writs of deceit, but they shall be as valid against the parties thereto, and persons claiming under them, as if not reversed as to the lord (s. 4). Fines and recoveries of lands in ancient demesne, levied or suffered in the manor court, after other fines and recoveries in a superior court, shall be valid, as if the tenure had not been changed, nor shall they be invalid in other cases, though levied or suffered in courts whose jurisdictions may not extend to the lands therein comprised (s. 5). The tenure of ancient demesne, where suspended or destroyed by fine or recovery in a superior court, shall be restored, where the rights of the lord have been recognised within twenty years immediately preceding January 1st, 1834 (s. 6).

Fines are made valid without amendment of any errors in form (s. 7), and so are recoveries (s. 8).

Provision is made for saving jurisdiction in cases unprovided for by the Act (s. 9). Recoveries are made valid where the bargain and sale, to make the tenant to the præcipe, has not been duly enrolled (s. 10), within six lunar months, in Chancery, under the provisions of the 27th Hen. VIII. c. 16. (This clause enlarges indefinitely the time for enrolment.) Also, where the owner of the legal freehold (the trustee) has not concurred in making a good tenant to the præcipe, provided the beneficial owner of the freehold in possession (the cestui que trust) shall, within the time limited for making the tenant, have conveyed to the tenant (s. 11). It is to be observed, that a recovery, void for want of an effectual legal conveyance, by a person seised at law for his own benefit, is not aided by this Act.

The following are the cases in which fines and recoveries are not made valid by the Act:—Where they have been wholly reversed before its passing; or partly, so far as the part reversed; where any person whom the fine or recovery, if valid, would have barred shall, before the Act, have had dealings with the lands, on the faith of the invalidity of the fine or recovery; where any person shall, at the passing of this Act, have been in possession in respect of an estate which the fine or recovery, if valid, would have barred; where any court of competent jurisdiction shall have refused to amend them; where proceedings were pending at the passing of this Act; and if such proceedings abate by the death of any of the parties thereto, any person having a right of action or suit by reason of the invalidity of such fine or recovery, shall retain it, if he commence proceedings within six calendar months after such party's death (s. 12).

The 13th section relates to the custody of the records of fines and recoveries. The 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 82, abolished the offices connected with fines and recoveries in the Court of Common Pleas, and transferred their records and duties to the officer of the same court, appointed under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, for registering the certificates of acknowledgment of married women, subject to the order of such court.

Estates-tail, and estates expectant thereon, are no longer barrable by warranty, since December 31st, 1833 (s. 14).

Thus, then, all the fictions, together with their cumbrous technicality, which had been invented by legal artifice and judicial contrivance in contravention of the unrepealed Statute de Donis, were abolished; and what the legislature could not do, in the reign of our second Edward, by reason of the mighty power of the barons—the great proprietors of the soil—it effected in the reign of our late sovereign, viz. the virtual repeal of the Statute of Westminster 2, and the recognition of the right of barring estates-tail, prescribing and simplifying the mode of disposition.

The general enabling clause (s. 15) enacts, that 'after December 31st, 1833, every actual tenant-in-tail (consult the glossary clause), whether in possession, remainder, contingency, or otherwise, shall have full power to dispose of, for an estate in fee-simple-absolute, or for any less estate, the lands entailed, as against all persons claiming the lands entailed by force of any estate-tail which shall be vested in, or might be claimed by, or which, but for some previous act, would have been vested in, or might have been claimed by the person making the disposition, at the time of his making the same, and also as against all persons, including the king's most excellent majesty, his heirs and successors, whose estates are to take effect after the determination, or in defeasance of any such estate-tail; saving always the rights of all persons in respect of estates prior to the estate-tail in respect of which such disposition shall be made, and the rights of all other persons except those against whom such disposition is by this act authorized to be made.' The 11 Hen. VII. c. 20, is repealed, except as to lands comprised in any settlement made before this Act, in which case if any woman be tenant-in-tail within the provisions of such Act, the power of disposition must be regulated thereby (ss. 16, 17). The power of disposition is not to extend to tenants of estates-tail, who, by the 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 20, are tenants-in-tail of any lands given by the Crown, the reversion or remainder being in the king, or who are by any other act restrained from barring their estates-tail, or to tenants-in-tail after possibility of issue extinct (s. 18). Power is then given to enlarge base-fees, created by barring estates-tail into fees-simple-absolute, with the same saving as is set forth in the fifteenth section, and with the protector's consent (s. 36); but the issue inheritable to any estate-tail cannot bar any expectancies (ss. 19, 20).

This clause puts an end to the power of an heir expectant in tail, whose fine with proclamations, levied in the father's lifetime, would have barred the estate-tail in the event of its devolving upon him or upon his issue-in-tail, but it is to be observed that this section does not apply to a gift under which the heirs are purchasers, as where the legal freehold is limited to A. with an equitable remainder to the heirs of his body, or the converse; or where there is a limitation to the heirs of the body of A. who takes no estate, or an estate less than freehold, for then the heirs take by original acquisition, and not in the language of this clause, 'as issue inheritable to any estate-tail.'

If a tenant-in-tail of lands dispose thereof by way of mortgage, or for any other limited purpose, 'such disposition shall, to the extent of the estate created, be an absolute bar, in equity as well as at law, to all persons as against whom such disposition is by this Act authorized to be made, notwithstanding any intention to the contrary may be expressed or implied in the deed by which the disposition may be effected; provided always, that if the estate thus created, shall be only an estate pour autre vie, or for years absolute or determinable, or an interest, charge, lien, or incumbrance be created without a term of years absolute or determinable, or any greater estate for securing or raising the same, then such disposition shall in equity be a bar only so far as may be necessary to give full effect to the mortgage, or to such other limited purpose, or to such interest, lien, charge, or incumbrance, notwithstanding any intention to the contrary may be expressed or implied in the deed by which the disposition may be effected (s. 22).

The meaning of this clause is simply this:—If a tenant-in-tail make a mortgage-in-fee with the usual proviso for redemption, he will be entitled to the equity of redemption discharged from the entail: but if he create an estate pour autre vie, or for years only, or an interest, charge, or incumbrance, without a term of years, by way of mortgage, the entail will be affected only to the extent of the charge, although there be an express declaration of intention that the deed shall operate as a complete bar of the entail. The object is to prevent a mere declaration that the entail shall or shall not be barred from having any operation, but not to affect express limitations.

In order to provide a check to the barring of estates-tail, so as to prevent a son, tenant-in-tail, upon attaining his majority, defeating a strict family settlement, against the wish of his father, the tenant for life, the legislature has introduced a reasonable but unaccountable agent, denominated 'the protector of the settlement,' who is, in many respects, but not in all (as will presently be seen) analogous to the abolished 'tenant to the præcipe,' who was a mere technical creature, and whose protection was both arbitrary and defective, besides being productive of numerous difficulties. The office of this novel conservative power (as it has been called) is to grant or withhold his consent, which is required to enable a tenant-in-tail in remainder, expectant on an estate of freehold, to bar as well his own issue as also those in remainder, to the same extent as might have been effected by a recovery. It is to be observed, that an expectant tenant-in-tail may bar his own issue only, under this Act, without the consent of the protector. See PROTECTOR OF THE SETTLEMENT.

We will now consider the clauses substituting more simple modes of assurance.

Every disposition of lands by a tenant-in-tail is to be effected by some one of the assurances evidenced by deed (not being a will or a contract either expressed or implied) used for the conveyance of fee-simple estates. If the tenant-in-tail be a feme covert, her husband's concurrence is necessary and her deed must be duly acknowledged (s. 40).

The tenant-in-tail, then, for the purposes of this Act, is treated as having a legal estate of fee-simple in the land (no matter what his estate-tail may be), and he must, therefore, convey by one of those modes of assurance which the law has appropriated to the transfer of freehold interests. These modes of assurance are feoffment (at the common law), bargain and sale, covenant to stand seised, a release (under the Statute of Uses), or grant, which is the best mode of assurance, and which must be adopted, if the estate be incorporeal.

As to the protector's consent, it may either be given by the same assurance by which the disposition is effected, or by a deed distinct from the assurance, executed either on, or at any time before the day on which the assurance is made, otherwise the consent will be void; if the protector consent by a distinct deed, such consent will be deemed absolute and unqualified unless he refer to the particular assurance, and confine his consent to the disposition thereby made. His consent once given cannot be revoked. A married woman, being a protector, gives her consent in the same manner as if she were a feme sole (ss. 42, 43, 44, 45).

The 47th section carefully excludes courts of equity from giving any effect to dispositions by tenants-in-tail, or to consents of protectors, which would not be effectual in courts of law.

In the case of a protector being lunatic, idiotic, or of unsound mind, the Lord Chancellor, or the Lords Justices of Appeal, upon the motion or petition of the tenant-in-tail, in a summary way, has or have full power to consent to a disposition by a tenant-in-tail, and to make such orders in the matter as shall be deemed necessary: and if any other person be a joint protector, he must give his consent in the ordinary manner. The order of the Lord Chancellor, or the Lords Justices, is to be evidence of consent, without any document or instrument (ss. 48, 49).

From the Lord Chancellor's and Lords Justices' decisions on applications in cases of lunatic protectors, it may be collected that the power will be exercised in support of the settlement, and not in opposition to its apparent designs. Lord Brougham, when Chancellor, made an order for enabling a quasi tenant-in-tail in remainder of stock, the produce of lands sold, under the order of the court, and subject to the same uses as the lands had been, and of which the tenant for life was a lunatic, to dispose of the fund, the case falling within the provisions of the 33rd and 48th sections of this Act. When the party has not been found a lunatic by inquisition, it will probably be referred to a Master in Lunacy to ascertain such fact. The Lord Chancellor is not, nor are the Lords Justices, authorized, when the tenant-in-tail in possession is in a state of hopeless lunacy, to consent to the first tenant-in-tail in remainder barring the subsequent limitations, even for the purpose of preventing the settled estate from going over to collateral relations. It will be observed that the 22nd, 33rd, and 48th sections provide only for the case of a lunatic who is tenant for life of the settled estate. Lord Cottenham, in re Newman (2 My. & C. 112), gave judgment as follows:—'This petition came before me as protector of the settlement under the Fines and Recoveries' Act, to induce me to consent to a deed of disposition on the part of the lunatic, who is tenant for life; to act, in fact, for the tenant for life, in order to give effect to a recovery (evidently meaning a deed of disposition under this Act). As protector of the settlement, the only duty of the court is, to see what, in reference to the interest of the family, it would be proper for the tenant for life to do; and the purpose must be rather to protect the objects of the settlement than to give any benefit to one member of the family, to the exclusion of the others. Now, if nothing is done, one-sixth will go to this daughter (the wife of the petitioner) and her children, if she have any, and if not, to the eldest son of the testator, as his right heir; and I am asked to consent to that which will take it away from the eldest son, and take it away from the family, by giving it to the husband of the daughter. That would be anything but protecting the settlement; it would be destroying it; giving the estate to a person not a member of the family, namely, the husband of the daughter. I should not consider that it would be a proper act for the tenant for life to concur in a deed of disposition to that effect.'

The Court of Chancery is not the protector where the tenant for life is a feme covert whose husband has been convicted of felony, and the life estate is not settled to her separate use.

Although it is clear that an estate-tail and remainders may be effectually destroyed by an assurance altogether silent as to its object, yet it will be advisable always to declare the intention, which may be inserted immediately before the operative parts, or at the close of the habendum. Some conveyancers refer to the act itself, but seeing that it is a public and well-known statute, such a reference appears to be quite unnecessary. They argue, however, that it removes all doubt as to the intention; for before the statute, a release, grant, or bargain and sale of the tenant-in-tail, although enrolled, passed only a base fee, determinable by the issue-in-tail; and, therefore, if this Act be not referred to, nor the intention to bar stated, a question may arise whether the assurance will take effect at common law, or operate under this Act. The reference is made ex abundanti cautelâ, and in the opinion of the best lawyers is altogether superfluous.

Every assurance by a tenant-in-tail (except a lease for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, to commence from the date of such lease, or from any time not exceeding twelve calendar months from the date of such lease, where a rent shall be thereby reserved, which, at the time of granting such lease, shall be a rack-rent or not less than five-sixth parts of a rack-rent) is inoperative, under this Act, unless enrolled in Chancery within six calendar months after its execution (s. 41). The enrolment of a bargain and sale or of a conveyance to charitable uses, according to this provision, will satisfy the requisition of the statutes 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, and 9 Geo. II. c. 36, the enrolment being in the same court and within the same period. If the protector's consent be given by a distinct deed, it will be void unless enrolled either at or before the time when the assurance is enrolled (s. 46).

This enrolment, requisite to give effect to a disentailing assurance, does not excuse a non-compliance with the requisition of any other law (except under the Acts 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, and 9 Geo. II. c. 36, just mentioned) in regard to enrolment or registration. If lands, therefore, lie within the registry districts, viz. Middlesex, Yorkshire, the Bedford Levels, and Kingston-upon-Hull, the deed must also be registered in the registry office of the district; or if it be the grant of an annuity, it must be registered according to 18 Vict. c. 15, s. 12. See ANNUITY.

Thus much as to the disentailment of freeholds. Let us next examine the sections relating to the barring of copyholds.

The previous clauses, except so far as they are varied by the clauses following, apply to copyholds; the disposition, however, of legal estates of copyhold must be by surrender, and of equitable estates either by surrender or by deed. If the protector consent by deed, it must be produced at or before the surrender, to the lord of the manor, his steward, or deputy, otherwise it will be void, and he will endorse on it the acknowledgment of production, and enter such deed and endorsement upon the manor rolls; the endorsement will be primâ facie evidence of the production; a memorandum of entry on the manor rolls must also be endorsed on the deed. But if the consent be not by deed it must be given to the person taking the surrender, and if the surrender be out of court, the consent must be stated in the memorandum of surrender signed by the protector and entered on the manor rolls, which shall be good evidence of the consent and surrender; but if the surrender be in court, the lord, steward, or deputy, enters the surrender on the manor rolls, with a statement that such consent was given, and such entries or copies shall be evidence, as other entries or copies. An equitable tenant-in-tail has power of disposition by deed entered on the manor rolls. If the protector consent by distinct deed, it will be void unless executed on or before the day of the execution of the disposing deed, and entered on the manor rolls. Such entries are imperative on the lord, steward, or deputy, who must enter such deed on the manor rolls, and endorse upon it a memorandum thereof. The deed of disposition (unless entered on the rolls) will be void against purchasers, whose assurance is duly entered on the manor rolls. Enrolment in Chancery is not requisite as to copyholds, entry on the manor rolls being a substitute for it (ss. 50, 51, 52, 53, 54).

Copyholds are not entailable except by special custom, and in the absence of such a custom the party who would have been tenant-in-tail will take a fee-simple conditional at common law.

The estates-tail of bankrupts are provided for by the following clauses: The 55th section repeals the Bankrupt Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, s. 65, so far as relates to estates-tail, but not to extend to the lands of a person made a bankrupt on or before the 31st December, 1833, nor to revive former acts; and the 56th section substitutes provisions enabling any commissioner, acting under a petition (under which there is an adjudication of a bankrupt, who at the time of filing such petition, or at any time afterwards, before he shall have obtained his certificate, shall be an actual tenant-in-tail in lands of any tenure), to dispose by deed to a purchaser for valuable consideration, for as large an estate as the bankrupt tenant-in-tail, of lands of any tenure could, at the time of such disposition, have effected, provided that if there be a non-consenting protector, the effect of the disposition will be equivalent only to that of a disentailing assurance made by the bankrupt without the protector's consent. If the bankrupt be entitled to a base fee, and there is no protector, the commissioner's deed enlarges it to the extent to which it might have been enlarged by the bankrupt. And the commissioner, with protector's consent (to be given in the same manner as we have before seen), confers a title to the fee, whether the estate-tail be subsisting or be already converted into a base fee. The deeds are to be enrolled according to whether the lands are freehold or copyhold, precisely as it has been before stated. In the case of the bankrupt being tenant-in-tail, and the protector not consenting so that only a base-fee is passed, such fee, on there ceasing during its continuance to be a protector, is enlarged for the purchaser's benefit. And if the bankrupt were entitled to a base-fee, arising from an estate-tail, to which, if the base-fee had not been created, he would have been entitled, and there should be a protector, such fee on there ceasing during its continuance to be a protector, would be enlarged for the benefit of the purchaser. The commissioner's disposition confirms voidable dispositions for valuable consideration made by the bankrupt whether tenant-in-tail or entitled to a base-fee, to their full extent, except where the bankrupt being tenant-in-tail, there is a non-consenting protector, and then to the extent only of the bankrupt's capacity, till there ceases, during the continuance of the base-fee, to be a protector, when the confirmation is completed without more, but subject to a saving of purchaser's rights from the commissioner, without express notice of the voidable estate.

All dispositions by the bankrupt, which if he had been owner in fee, would have been void as against the assignees, are avoided as against the commissioner's disposition, but, except as against the commissioner and the assignees, and persons claiming under them, the powers of disposition given by the Act are preserved to the bankrupt. The bankrupt's death before the commissioner's power is executed, is provided for by enacting that the commissioner's dispositions shall have the same effect, in the cases about to be enumerated, as if the bankrupt tenant-in-tail or entitled to a base-fee, arising as already mentioned, were living:—1st, in case there shall be no protector at the bankrupt's death, in which case the commissioner's disposition passes the fee-simple; 2ndly, in case the bankrupt tenant-in-tail has left issue in tail, existing at the time of the disposition, and there is either no protector or a protector consenting or non-consenting, in which cases the commissioner's disposition, there being a consenting protector, will pass the fee-simple, or, there being a non-consenting protector, will pass a base-fee; 3rdly, in case the bankrupt, entitled to a base-fee arising as already mentioned, has left issue existing at the time of the disposition, which issue would have been inheritable, and there is either no protector or a consenting protector, in which case the commissioner's disposition passes the fee-simple. The commissioner's disposition of the copyhold lands, not merely equitable, gives the effect of a surrender to the use of the disponee for the estate acquired by the disposition, and the disponee is entitled to admittance on paying the fines and fees. The mesne rents and profits of the lands over which the commissioner's power extends, until a disposition is made, or is ascertained to be necessary, are given to the assignees, who are armed with remedies for recovering arrears, enforcing covenants and conditions, and ejecting tenants. The bankrupt clauses extend to Ireland, but deeds of disposition, and of consent, relating to such lands, must be enrolled in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, within six calendar months after execution (ss. 57–69, both inclusive). See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 208.

The next set of enactments relate to money directed to be laid out in entailed lands.

It is a great equitable principle that money directed to be applied to the purchase of land is considered real estate, and is impressed with all the characteristics of realty; it is no longer, in the contemplation of equity, personalty; and upon the death of the person entitled to it it will descend to the heir-at-law, and cannot be distributed among the next of kin. Under the old law, the tenant-in-tail of this quasi land, having also the immediate remainder or reversion in fee vested in himself, could obtain payment of the entailed money by the decree of the Court of Chancery. But if the remainder or reversion were to another person, he could not have effected anything, either upon the land, because, it could not be the subject of a recovery until ascertained, or upon the money, which never could form the subject of a recovery. At length, by the 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 56, re-enacted with alterations by 7 Geo. IV. c. 45, it was provided that in all cases where money under the control of Chancery, or of which trustees were possessed, should be subject to be invested in the purchase of freehold or copyhold lands, to be settled in such manner that it should be competent for the persons who would be the tenants-in-tail thereof, either alone or with the owners of any particular preceding estates therein, to bar such estates-tail and remainders, that it should not be necessary to have such money actually invested in land, but a court of equity, on the petition of the person who would be tenant-in-tail of the land, and the party having any antecedent estates (being adults, or femes covert, separately examined), might order such money to be paid to them, or applied as they should appoint. But the costly agency of the Court of Chancery, which always referred the petition to a master, to inquire whether the petitioner were entitled to be tenant-in-tail, and whether he had encumbered the fund or not, not to say anything of the slowness of the process (for a vacation order was ineffectual, if the tenant-in-tail did not live till the second day of the ensuing term, nor would an order be made in term unless there were time to suffer a recovery during it), rendered this practice a grievance; accordingly the 70th section of this Act abolished these statutes, and provided that as well lands of every tenure, of which the produce by sale is applicable to the purchase of lands to be entailed, as money so applicable, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as the purchased lands, and be dealt with according to the disentailing provisions already stated. The fund, when constituted of land made saleable, not being copyhold, is to be dealt with as freehold, or being copyhold as copyhold; and when constituted of money is to be dealt with as freehold land. But leaseholds for years and money are to be treated, as to the person in whose favor the disentailing provision is made, as personal estate, and to be assigned by deed, enrolled as aforesaid, except in the case of bankruptcy, when the disposition is made by the commissioner, and completed by enrolment, as before provided in regard to lands not being copyhold (s. 71). With regard to bankrupts, the preceding provision is applied for benefit of the creditors, to a fund consisting of lands in Ireland, or money under the control of any Irish equity court, or held by any individuals as trustees in Ireland, where the bankrupt would be tenant-in-tail of the purchased land; but the deed of any commissioner or protector is to be enrolled in the Irish Court of Chancery within six calendar months after the execution, where the fund is land; otherwise in the English Court of Chancery (s. 72).

It is to be observed, that the practice of requiring deeds to be acknowledged before enrolment, is not applicable to deeds enrolled under this Act (s. 73). Every deed requiring enrolment, by which lands or money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands shall be disposed of under this Act, shall take effect as if enrolment had not been required, and shall have preference except against a purchaser for valuable consideration, claiming under a subsequent deed previously enrolled (s. 74). It is, therefore, necessary for purchasers and mortgagees to enrol the deed under which they claim, without delay, and they should ascertain, by a proper search, that no conveyance, prior to their own, made by the tenant-in-tail, has been enrolled.

The Court of Chancery may regulate the fees to be paid for the enrolment of deeds, and for searches and office copies (s. 75). No order has been made; the charge for enrolling deeds is one shilling per folio. The Court of Common Pleas may regulate the fees to be paid for entries on court-rolls, and for endorsements on deeds, and for taking consents and surrenders in cases of dispositions by tenants-in-tail of copyholds (s. 76).

The fees are fixed by the Common Pleas rules of Hilary Term, 1834, and are as follow:

	s.	d.
For the endorsement on the deed of the memorandum of production, and memorandum of entry on court rolls to be signed by the lord's steward or deputy steward, each indorsement of memorandum, five shillings, together	10	0

	s.	d.
For the entries on the court-rolls of deeds and indorsements thereon, at per folio of seventy-two words .	0	6
For taking the consent of each protector of settlement of lands .	13	4
For taking the surrender of each tenant-in-tail of lands . . .	13	4
For entries of such surrenders, or the memoranda thereof, in the court-rolls, at per folio of seventy-two words	0	6

See ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF A WIFE'S ASSURANCE for the remaining sections of this Act.

Tail after possibility of issue extinct, Tenant in. This estate arises out of a special entail as to the parentage of the issue, when the express condition has become impossible by reason of death. Thus, if an estate be granted to husband and wife, and their issue male or female, if either of them die without issue, the survivor is tenant-in-tail after possibility of issue extinct; and even if there have been issue, yet if the issue die without issue, then the surviving parent is also such a tenant; and also if an estate be entailed upon a man and his issue from a particular wife, if she die without issue, the interest of the husband becomes reduced to a tenancy-in-tail after possibility of issue extinct. Only a donee-in-tail special can become such a tenant, for if the entail be general, such a tenancy can never arise; for whilst he lives he may have issue, the law not admitting the impossibility of having children at any age. As an estate-tail is originally carved out of a fee-simple, so this estate is carved out of a special entail.

There may be tenant-in-tail after possibility &c. of a remainder as well as of a possession. And thus, if a lease for life be made, remainder to husband and wife in special tail, and the husband die without issue, now is the wife tenant-in-tail after possibility &c. of this remainder; and if the tenant for life surrender to her, as he may (an estate for one's own life being greater than an estate for the life of another), now is she tenant-in-tail after possibility &c. in possession.—Lewis Bowles's case, 11 Co. 81 a.

This estate must be created by the act of God—death; it cannot arise out of any arrangement of parties, but ex dispositione legis, and not ex provisione hominis; if, therefore, an estate be given to husband and wife, and the heirs of their bodies, should they afterwards be divorced causâ præcontractûs vel consanguinitatis vel affinitatis, their estate is converted into a joint estate for life, and not into a tenancy-in-tail after possibility of issue extinct, because their estate has been altered by their own act, and not by the act of God. Such a tenancy can endure only for the life of the surviving donee-in-tail, who has no power under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 18, to bar the remainders or reversion over, and if he convey his interest to another, such other will be only a tenant pur autre vie, and would be punishable for waste.

The attributes of this estate are these:—

(1) The tenant is dispunishable for waste; he may, therefore, not only commit it, but also convert to his own use the property wasted. Equity, however, will restrain him from committing wilful waste.

(2) The estate is liable to forfeiture.

(3) It will merge in a fee-simple or fee-tail, immediately expectant thereon.

(4) The reversioner or remainder-man shall be received upon the tenant's default.

(5) An exchange with a tenant for life is good, the interest being deemed equal, and only differing in quality.

(6) It is deemed a life estate only for the purposes of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 1.

Tailage [fr. tailler, Fr.], a piece cut out of the whole; a share of one's substance paid by way of tribute; a toll or tax.—Cowel.

Taille, the fee which is opposed to fee-simple, because it is so minced or pared that it is not in the owner's free power to dispose of it, but is, by the first giver, cut or divided from all other, and tied to the issue of the donee. In short, an estate-tail. See TAIL.

Tailzie, or Entail, an arbitrary line of succession laid down by a proprietor, in substitution of a legal line of succession which has failed.—Scotch term. A deed of tailzie creates a Scotch entail by which, until 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 94, an estate might be tied up for ever.

Taking up dead bodies for the purpose of dissection or otherwise, is a misdemeanor at common law, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. See ANATOMY ACT.

Tale, Chinese money; also, a count in a declaration.

Tales de circumstantibus. If a sufficient number of jurors do not appear upon a trial, or if by means of challenges or exemptions a sufficient number of unexceptionable ones do not remain, either party may pray a tales; which is a supply of such men as are summoned upon the panel, in order to make up a deficiency. See 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 37; 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 383, 378.

Talesman, a person summoned to act as a juror from amongst the by-standers in the court.

Talion, law of retaliation. See LEX TALIONIS.

Talis interpretatio semper fienda est, ut evitetur absurdum, et inconveniens, et ne judicium sit illusorium.—1 Co. 52.—(Interpretation is always to be made in such a manner, that what is absurd and inconvenient is to be avoided, lest the judgment be illusory.)

Talis non est eadem; nam nullum simile est

idem.—4 Co. 18.—(What is like is not the same ; for nothing similar is the same.)

Talis res, vel tale rectum, quæ vel quod non est in homine adtunc superstite sed tantummodo est et consistit in consideratione et intelligentiâ legis, et quod alii dixerunt talem rem vel tale rectum fore in nubibus.—Co. Litt. 342.—(Such a thing or such a right as is not vested in a person then living, but merely exists in the consideration and contemplation of law [is said to be in abeyance], and others have said that such a thing or such a right is in the clouds.)

Tallagers, tax or toll-gatherers.

Tallagium facere, to give up accounts in the Exchequer, where the method of accounting was by talleys.

Talley, or Tally, a stick cut into two parts, on each whereof is marked, with notches or otherwise, what is due between debtor and creditor. It was the ancient mode of keeping accounts; one part was held by the creditor, and the other by the debtor. The use of tallies in the Exchequer was abolished by 23 Geo. III. c. 82, and the old tallies were ordered to be destroyed by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 15.

Tallia, commons in meat and drink.

Talliage. See TAILLAGE.

Tally trade, a system of dealing by which shopkeepers furnish certain articles on credit, upon an agreement for the payment of the stipulated price by certain weekly or monthly instalments.—McCull. Comm. Dict. A tally was a common security for money in the days of Edward I.—2 Reeves c. xi., p. 253 n (b.)

Talookdar, a holder of a talook, which is a small portion of land; a petty land agent.—Indian.

Tam quam, writ of error from inferior courts, when the error is supposed to be as well in giving the judgment as in awarding execution upon it. (Tam in redditione judicii, quam in adjudicatione executionis.)

Tangible property, corporeal property.

Tanistry, or Tanistria, an ancient municipal law or tenure, which allotted the inheritance of lands, castles, &c. to the oldest and most worthy and capable person of the deceased's name and blood, without any regard to proximity. This, in reality, was giving it to the strongest, and naturally occasioned bloody wars in families; for which reason it was abolished in the reign of James I.—Encyc. Lond.; 3 Hall. Const. Inst. c. xviii., p. 377.

Tannahdar, a petty police-officer.—Indian.

Tantum bona valent, quantum vendi possunt. 3 Inst. 305.—(Things are worth what they will sell for.)

Tarde venit [Lat.] (it came too late).

Tare and Tret, the first is an allowance in merchandise, made to a buyer for the weight of the box, bag, or cask, wherein goods are packed; and the last is a deduction from the weight, for waste in emptying and reselling the goods, by dust, dirt, breaking, &c.

Tare is distinguished into—

(1) Real tare, i. e. the actual weight of the package.

(2) Customary tare, its supposed weight, according to the practice among merchants.

(3) Computed tare, an estimated allowance agreed upon at the time.

(4) Average tare, the medium deduced from weighing a few packages, and taking it as a standard for the whole. See ALLOWANCE.

(5) Super tare, an additional allowance where the commodity or package exceeds a certain weight.

Tariff [Span.], a cartel of commerce, a book of rates, a table or catalogue, drawn usually in alphabetical order, containing the names of several kinds of merchandise, with the duties or customs to be paid for the same, as settled by authority, or agreed on between the several princes and states that hold commerce together. Encyc. Lond.

Tasmania, formerly called Van Diemen's Land. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 13; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 95; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 57; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 56; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 52.

Tath. In the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, the lords of manors claimed the privilege of having their tenants' flocks or sheep brought at night upon their own demense lands, there to be folded for the improvement of the ground, which liberty was called by the name of the tath.—Spelm.

Tau, a cross.

Tauri liberi libertas, a common bull, because he is free to all the tenants within such a manor, liberty, &c.

Tax [fr. tâsg, Wel.; taxe, Fr. and Dut.], an impost; a tribute imposed on the subject; an excise; tallage. A tax may now be defined to be a certain aid, subsidy, or supply, granted by the Commons in parliament assembled, and confirmed by Act of Parliament, constituting the sovereign's extraordinary revenue, and paid yearly towards the expenses of government. 1 Bl. Com. c. viii.

The general principles of taxation are these:

(1) The subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support of the government, as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation.

(2) The tax which each individual is bound to pay ought to be certain and not arbitrary. The time of payment, the manner of payment, the quantity to be paid, ought all to be clear and plain to the contributor, and to every other person.

(3) Every tax ought to be levied at the time, or in the manner, in which it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay it.

(4) Every tax ought to be so contrived, as both to take out and keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the state.

Taxes are either direct or indirect. A direct tax is one that is demanded from the very persons who are intended or desired to pay it. Indirect taxes are those which are demanded from one person, in the expectation and intention that he shall indemnify himself at the expense of another: such as the excise or customs. Taxes may be laid on any one of the three sources of income (rent, profits, or wages); or a uniform tax on all of them.—3 Smi. Wealth of Nat. b. 5, c. ii., and 2 Mill's Pol. Eco. b. 5, cc. ii., iii.

Taxatio Ecclesiastica, the valuation of ecclesiastical benefices made through every diocese in England, on occasion of Pope Innocent IV. granting to King Henry III. the tenth of all spirituals for three years. This taxation was first made by Walter, Bishop of Norwich, delegated by the Pope to this office in 38 Hen. III. and hence called taxatio norwicensis. It is also called Pope Innocent's Valor.

Taxers, two officers yearly chosen in Cambridge to see the true gauge of all the weights and measures.

Taxing-masters, officers of the courts, who examine and allow or disallow items in bills of costs. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 506; and Smi. Ch. Pr. 12, 62, 829.

Taxt-ward, an annual payment heretofore made to a superior in Scotland, instead of the duties due to him under the tenure of ward-holding. Abolished.

Team, or Theame [fr. tyman, Sax., to teem or bring forth], a royalty or privilege granted, by royal charter, to a lord of a manor, for the having, restraining, and judging of bondmen and villeins, with their children, goods, and chattels, &c.—Glan. l. 5, c. ii.

Teamster, a waggoner who carries goods for hire.

Technical, belonging to art.

Teding-penny, tething-penny, tithing-penny, a small duty or payment to the sheriff, from each tithing, towards the charge of keeping courts, &c. from which some of the religious were exempted by royal charter.

Teep, a note of hand, a promissory note given by a native banker or money-lender to zemindars and others, to enable them to furnish government with security for the payment of their rents.—Indian.

Tehsildar, one who has charge of the collections; a native collector of a district acting under a European or zemindar.—Indian.

Teind-masters, those entitled to tithes.

Teinds, tithes.

Teinland, thaneland, which see.

Telegraphiæ, written evidence of things past.—Blount. See ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

Teller, one who numbers; a numberer; four officers in the Exchequer, whose offices were abolished by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 15.

Telligraphum [fr. tellus, Lat., land; and γράφω, Gk., to write], an Anglo-Saxon charter of land.—1 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law. c. i., p. 10.

Tellwore, that labor which a tenant was bound to do for his lord, for a certain number of days.

Tementale, or Tenementale, a tax of two shillings upon every ploughland; a decennary.

Templar, a student of the law, or barrister, being a member of the Middle or Inner Temple.

Temples, the two inns of court, thus called, because anciently the dwelling-house of the Knights-Templars. On the suppression of that order, they were purchased by some professors of the common law, and converted into hospitia or inns of court. They are called the Inner and Middle Temple, in relation to Essex House, which was also a part of the house of the Templars, and called the Outer Temple, because situated without Temple-bar.—Encyc. Lond.

Temporal lords, the peers of the realm; the bishops are not in strictness held to be peers, but merely lords of parliament.

Temporality, or Temporals, secular possessions, as distinguished from ecclesiastical rights; such revenues, lands, and tenements as archbishops and bishops have had annexed to their sees by the kings and others, from time to time, as they are barons and lords of parliament.—Cowel.

Temporalty, the laity; secular people.

Temptatio, or Tentatio, a trial or proof.

Tempus pacis est quando cancellaria et aliæ curiæ regiæ sunt apertæ, quibus lex fiebat cuicunque prout fieri consuevit. Utrum terra sit guerrina, necne, naturaliter debet judicari per recorda regis et eorum qui curias regis per legem terræ custodiunt et gubernant, sed non alio modo. Co. Litt. 249 b.—(Time of peace is when the Chancery and the king's other courts are open, in which justice may be rendered to every one as far as it has been accustomed to be done. Whether the land is in a state of war or not ought naturally to be determined by the records of the king, and of those who guard and administer the courts of the king, according to the law of the land, and in no other way.)

Tempus pessonis, mast-time in the forest, which is about Michaelmas to St. Martin's Day, November 11.

Tempus semestre, half a year, and not six lunar months.—West. II. c. 5.

Tena, a coif worn by ecclesiastics.

Tenancy [fr. tenentia, law Lat.], the condition of a tenant; also the temporary possession of what belongs to another.

Tenancy in common. This estate is created when several persons have several distinct estates, either of the same or of a different quantity, in any subject of property, in equal or unequal shares, and either by the same act or by several acts, and by several titles, and not a joint title.

A tenancy-in-common differs from a joint-tenancy in this respect; joint-tenants have one estate in the whole, and no estate in any particular part; they have the power of alienation over their respective aliquot parts, and, by exercising that power, may give a separate and distinct right to their particular parts. Tenants-in-common have several and distinct estates in their respective parts; hence the difference in the several modes of assurance by them. Each tenant-in-common has, in contemplation of law, a distinct tenement and a distinct freehold.

The best way to create a tenancy-in-common is either to limit one moiety of the premises expressly to one, and the other moiety to the other, or to use the words 'to hold as tenants-in-common;' as the law may otherwise construe it a joint estate. In a will, the words 'equally to be divided'—'equally between or to them'—'equally' alone—'respectively'—'rateably' 'share and share alike,' and words of a similar distributive import, create a tenancy-in-common, as well in respect of real as personal estate.

It may also be created whenever an estate in joint-tenancy or coparcenary is dissolved by the severance of the title or interest, so that there be no partition made, but the unity of possession continues.

A tenancy-in-common may be by prescription; as the tenants prescribing for themselves and their ancestors that the estate had been left in common for a time, which will make a good prescriptive title.—Litt. s. 310.

Tenants-in-common hold by unity of possession, because neither of them knows his own severalty, and therefore they all occupy promiscuously. This is the only unity belonging to the estate; for since the tenants may hold different kinds of interests so there exists no necessary unity of interest, and there is no unity of title, for one may claim by descent, and another by purchase; also the estate may vest in each tenant at different times. There being no entirety of interest among tenants-in-common, each is seised of a distinct though undivided share; they hold per my et non per tout, and consequently the jus accrescendi does not apply to them. They may maintain actions of account against each other under 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 27.

This estate is subject to curtesy and dower. It is dissolvable.

(1) By a voluntary deed of partition.

(2) By the union of all the titles and interests in one tenant by grant, devise, surrender, or otherwise, which reduces the whole estate to a severalty.

(3) By compulsive partition, under a decree in Chancery, or under an enclosure act.

Tenant, one that holds of another; one that, on certain conditions, has temporary possession and use of that which is in reality the property of another; correlative to landlord.—Encyc. Lond.

Tenantable repair, such a repair as will render a house fit for present habitation.

Tenant-right, a custom either ensuring a permanence of tenure in the same occupant without liability to any other increase of rent than may be sanctioned by the general sentiments of the community; or entitling a tenant of a farm to receive purchase-money, amounting to so many years' rent, on its being transferred to another tenant. It prevails in Ulster. 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 385.

Tenantry, a body of tenants on an estate.

Tende, to tender or offer.

Tender, offer; proposal for acceptance.

A tender of satisfaction is allowed to be made in most actions for money demands. It need not be made by the debtor personally to the creditor personally; it may be made through an authorized agent, and a tender to one of several joint creditors is sufficient. A tender must be absolute and unconditional, and the money must be actually produced at the time of the tender, unless that be dispensed with by the creditor. No copper coin can be tendered when the debt is sixpence or upwards. No tender of silver coin above forty shillings is legal, and Bank of England notes are a legal tender for debts above 5*l.*—56 Geo. III. c. 68; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 98, s. 6. A plea of tender admits the contract and facts stated in the declaration. See PAYMENT OF MONEY INTO COURT.

Tenement [fr. teneo, Lat., to hold], in its vulgar acceptation, is only applied to houses and other buildings, but in its original, proper, and legal sense it signifies everything that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature, whether it be of a substantial and sensible or of an unsubstantial, ideal kind. Thus liberum tenementum, frank tenement or freehold, is applicable not only to lands and other solid objects, but also to offices, rents, commons, advowsons, franchises, peerages, &c. 2 Bl. Com. 16.

Tenementary land, the outland of manors, granted to tenants by the Saxon thanes, under arbitrary rents and services.—Spelm.

Tenementis legatis, an ancient writ, lying to the city of London, or any other corporation (where the old custom was, that men might devise by will lands and tenements, as well as goods and chattels), for the hearing and determining any controversy touching the same. Reg. Orig. 244.

Tenendas, that clause of a charter by which the particular tenure is expressed.

Tenendum, that clause in a deed wherein the tenure of the land is limited and created. Its office is to limit and appoint the tenure of the land which is held, and how and of whom it is to be held. See DEED.

Tenens nil facere potest, propter obligationem homagii, quod vertatur domino ad exhæredationem, vel aliam atrocem injuriam; nec dominus tenenti è converso. Quod si fecerint, dissolvitur et extinguitur homagium omnino, et homagii connexio et obligatio; et erit inde justum judicium cum venerit contra homagium et fidelitatis sacramentum, quod in eo in quo delinquunt puniantur; scilicet, in personâ domini quod amittat dominium, et in personâ tenentis quod amittat tenementum.—Co. Litt. 65.—(The tenant, by force of the obligation of homage, can do no action which may operate to the disinheriting his lord, or doing him any atrocious injury; and so conversely, cannot the lord, as against the tenant. For if they act in such a manner, they dissolve and extinguish altogether the homage and the connexion and obligation of homage; and when anything is done contrary to the homage and the oath of fidelity, it is just that the parties be punished through that very thing with regard to which they are guilty; that is to say, that the lord lose his lordship; and the tenant his tenement [according as one or the other is guilty].

Tenentibus in assisâ non onerandis, a writ that formerly lay for him to whom a disseisor had alienated the land whereof he disseised another, that he should not be molested in assise for damages, if the disseisor had wherewith to satisfy them.—Reg. Orig. 214.

Tenet [Lat.] (he holds).

Tenheded, or Tienheofed [Sax.], a dean.

Tenmentalè, or Tenmantale, the number of ten men, which number, in the time of the Saxons, was called a decennary; and ten decennaries made what we call a hundred. Also, a duty or tribute paid to the Crown, consisting of two shillings for each ploughland.—Encyc. Lond.

Tennè, tawny, orange or brusk; orange color.

In engravings it should be represented by lines in bend sinister crossed by others barways. Heralds who blazon by the names of the heavenly bodies, call it dragon's-head, and those who employ jewels, hyacinth. It is one of the colors called stainand.—Heraldic term.

Tennis, Game of, legalized by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109.

Tenor, sense contained; general course or drift. Tenor implies that a correct copy is set out, but the word effect alone implies that the substance only is set out.

Tenor investituræ est inspiciendus.—Wright's Ten. 21.—(The tenor of an investiture is to be searched into.)

Tenore indictamenti mittendo, a writ whereby the record of an indictment, and the process thereupon, is called out of another court into the Queen's Bench. See CERTIORARI.

Tenore præsentium (by the tenor of these presents), the matter contained therein, or rather the intent and meaning thereof.

Tenseriæ, a sort of ancient tax or military contribution.

Tentates panis, the essay or assay of bread. Blount.

Tenths [decimæ, Lat.], tithes; also the tenth part of the annual value of every spiritual benefice, according to the valuation in the king's books, being that yearly portion or tribute which all ecclesiastical livings formerly paid to the Crown.

Tenuit [Lat.] (which he held).

Tenure est pactio contra communen feudi naturam ac rationem, in contractu interposita. Wright's Ten. 21.—(Tenure is a compact contrary to the common nature and reason of the fee, put into a contract.)

Tenure, the mode of holding property, and is the direct result of feudalism, which separated the dominium directum (the dominion of the soil), and placed it mediately, or immediately, in the Crown, from the dominium utile (the possessory title), the right to the use and profits in the soil, designated by the term seisin, which is the highest interest a subject can acquire.

Without tracing the origin of tenure into remote and unsatisfactory antiquity, it is clearly ascertained that there were originally two modes of holding land, viz.:—(1) Allodial (from los, signifying lot), over which the owner had entire and irresponsible dominion, which he could dispose of at his own pleasure, or transmit as an inheritance to his children. The land was also attachable to answer the owner's debts, and could also be made available for commercial enterprise. Such tenure was acquired upon the distribution of lands by lot, among the Franks. (2) Feudal (from od, possession, or estate, and feo, wages, pay), over which the owner had but a conditional dominion acknowledging a superior lord, upon whose pleasure the tenure precariously depended, and without whose consent nothing could be done. And this is the groundwork of the feudal system, which displaced the laws imposed upon this country by the Saxons and the Danes, who, migrating from the forests of Germany, had established themselves and their laws in this kingdom.

Amidst the conflicting opinions relative to the sources of our ancient laws, the better opinion appears to be that they were derived from the primeval customs and codes of the German tribes, the capitularia of the Frank and Merovingian line of French kings, and particularly from the feudality of the province of Normandy. And although the notion of the feudal system may be traced among the Saxon institutions, its complete development did not take place until the twentieth year of the reign of William the Conqueror, just after the compilation of Domesday Book (from the Saxon dom, a judgment), which was a survey of all the lands in England, referring to the time of Edward the Confessor, as the Domesday Book of Alfred referred to the time of Ethelred. Thus the imperfect liberties of the Anglo-Saxons were infringed, and the people reduced to a state of vassalage under the king or barons, and the lower orders to positive slavery.

The logomachy (for it is nothing more than a dispute about words), as to whether the Norman acquired or conquered this country, and the attempt to give to the word conquest the meaning of acquisition in a feudal sense, are mere idle ingenuities. The historical facts are these:—In the fifth century some bands of Saxon pirates landed in this country, and, after committing atrocious cruelties, established themselves in it. The state of society amongst the Saxons was extremely rude; violence, and not justice, prevailed; liberty was pretended, but the rich and powerful carried on their depredations unrestrained by law. At length, in the 11th century, the Normans, equally predatory in their habits, but much more polished and chivalrous in their manners, headed by William, Duke of Normandy, invaded our island. After defeat of the Saxons, at the battle of Hastings, William, thence called 'the Conqueror,' ascended our throne as king.

The historians of this period agree that the Norman's administration was upheld by arms; that his laws made distinctions between the English and his own troops, in favor of the latter; that he totally disregarded both the interests and affections of the natives, and, as Hume remarks, in the fourth chapter of his history, 'if there were an interval when he assumed the appearance of a legal sovereign, the period was very short, and was nothing but a temporary sacrifice, which he, as has been the case with most conquerors, was obliged to make of his inclinations to present policy. Scarce any of those revolutions which, both in history and common language, have always been denominated conquests, appear equally violent, or were attended with so sudden an alteration both of power or property.' After showing the difference between the Romans and the Normans in their treatment of their subjugated possessions, the historian says: 'Except the former conquest of England by the Saxons themselves, who were induced by peculiar circumstances to proceed even to the extermination of the natives, it would be difficult to find in all history a revolution more destructive, or attended with a more complete subjection of the ancient inhabitants. Contumely seems even to have been wantonly added to oppression, and the natives were universally reduced to such a state of meanness and poverty, that the English name became a term of reproach, and several generations elapsed before one family of Saxon pedigree was raised to any considerable honors, or could so much as attain the rank of baron of the realm.' Upon reading this part of our history, it is difficult to come to any conclusion other than that the term 'conquest,' as applied to the Norman establishment in this country, means, and literally was, warlike subjugation, by superior military force.

The principles of the feudal-system were based then upon conquest, the hordes from Celtic Europe became soldiers of fortune, and, after subduing a country, they instituted a regular plan of military confederation, the provisions of which had for their object the preservation of the spoils of war, and the permanence of victory. Thus, large districts of land were given to the superior officers by the conquering general, and these districts were again granted in smaller allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. The wisdom which the northern invaders evinced in these institutions, as well as the valour they displayed in the defence of their acquisitions, alarmed the princes of Europe, who, in order to preserve their dominions, adopted a similar policy. Their subjects also fell in with these changes, because, by such arrangements, they acquired the protection of some powerful lord, without which, in those times of anarchy and confusion, it was scarcely possible for an isolated individual to preserve either his liberty or his property. As allodial land was on the whole much more desirable than feudal, such a conversion would appear very surprising, unless it could be explained by the reason just mentioned, to which it may be added that the composition or fine for the commission of a crime against the feudatory was much greater than that for a person who held his land by an allodial tenure. Thus nearly all allodial property was destroyed, and feudalism became the law of the western nations. Small tracts of allodial lands, however, are to be found in Germany, France, Holland, and even in Normandy, and some in Scotland. It should be remarked, that where allodial tenure was converted into feudal, such lands were from the beginning hereditary, which was not the case where the feudal law was established by the iron right of conquest.

Out of feudalism arose the fictitious maxim, that all lands in this kingdom were originally granted by our kings, and held mediately or immediately of the king, as lord paramount, in consideration of certain services to be rendered by the holder. There is then no allodial land in England. Those who held immediately from the king were called tenants in capite (in chief), which was the most honourable tenure. This was of two kinds, either ut de honore, where the land was held of the king as proprietor of some honor, castle, or manor, or ut de coronâ, where it was held of him in right of the Crown itself. When these tenants granted portions of their lands to inferior persons they were called mesne (middle) lords or barons, with regard to such inferior holders, who were styled tenants paravail, the lowest tenant, because they were supposed to make avail or profit of the land. The lands were called feuds (feoda), either proper, which were purely military, given militiæ gratiâ, without price, to persons duly qualified for military service; or improper, which did not, in point of acquisition, services, and the like, strictly conform to the nature of a mere military feud, such as those that were sold or bartered for any equivalent, or granted free from all circumstances, or in consideration of any certain services.

In modern phraseology, the thing holden is called a tenement, the holder of it a tenant, and the manner of holding it a tenure. Lay tenements were divided into two great classes, viz., frank-tenement or freehold, and villenage.

Frank-tenements were subdivided into knight-service and free socage.

Knight-service proper, or tenure in chivalry, was the original and most honorable species of tenure, created by a determinate quantity of land called a knight's fee. Its extent was twelve plough-lands, that is, as much land as could be reasonably ploughed in one year by twelve ploughs, or, according to other authorities, 800 acres of land, and others say 680, and its value in those times was twenty pounds per annum. This tenure was granted by words of pure donation, dedi et concessi (I have given and granted); transferred by investiture, i. e. by a solemn and public delivery of the very land itself by the lord to a vassal, in the presence of his other vassals, and perfected by homage and fealty; homage being the acknowledgment of tenure, and fealty the solemn oath made by the vassal of fidelity and attachment to the lord.

The holder of a knight's fee was bound to attend the lord to the wars on horseback, armed as a knight, for forty days in every year, if called upon, and this attendance was his rent or service for the land he held; but if he had only half a knight's fee, he attended only twenty days, and so on in proportion. Seven other services were afterwards superinduced upon this tenure, viz.:—

(1) Aids, which were three, to ransom the lord's person, if taken prisoner; to make the lord's eldest son a knight, attended with great pomp and expense, when he was fifteen years of age; and to marry the lord's eldest daughter, by giving her a portion.

(2) Relief, which was a fine or composition with the lord for taking up the tenure lapsed or fallen in by the death of the last tenant. The fine was 100*s*. payable if the heir at his ancestor's death were of age.

(3) Primer seisin was a right which the king had, when any of his tenants in capite died, possessed of a knight's fee, to receive from the heir (if he were of age) a year's profits of the lands, if they were in immediate possession, and half a year's profits, if they were expectant on a life estate.

(4) Wardship of the heir, if under the age of twenty-one, being a male, or fourteen, being a female, belonged to the lord, who was then called the guardian in chivalry. He had the custody of the heir, together with the lands (without accounting for the profits, and subject only to the infant's bare maintenance), till the age of twenty-one (males), and sixteen (females). The heir-male was supposed to be incapable of performing knight-service till twenty-one; but the female was supposed to be capable of marrying at fourteen, and then her husband might perform the service. When the heir-male attained twenty-one, or the female sixteen, he or she might sue out a writ of ousterlemain (amovere manum, Lat.), in order to get the lands out of the guardian's hand, the fine upon which was one half year's profits of the land. In order to ascertain these profits, which arose to the Crown, the court of awards and liveries was erected by the 32 Hen. VIII. c. 46.

(5) Marriage, which was the right of disposing of the infant-ward in matrimony by the guardian in chivalry. If the infant refused the person tendered, he or she forfeited the value of the marriage, i. e. so much as a jury would assess, or any one would give to the guardian for such an alliance; or if the infant married without the guardian's consent, the fine was double the value of the marriage; but this last fine did not extend to heirs female.

(6) Fines due to the lord for every alienation, i. e. whenever the tenant had occasion to make over the land to another. One-third of the yearly value was paid for the lord's license; but if the tenant aliened without the lord's license, a full year's value was the fine.

(7) Escheat, which is a species of reversion; for if the tenant died without heirs of his blood, or if he had committed treason or felony, the mutual bond between the lord and such tenant was dissolved, and the tenure being determined, the land resulted back to the lord who gave it. But the statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 10, enacts, that after the death of a person attainted of treason or felony, the attainder (i. e. when sentence is pronounced upon the conviction), shall not prevent any person from inheriting land who would have been capable of inheriting the same by tracing his descent through such relation, if he had not been attainted, unless such lands shall have escheated in consequence of such attainder before the 1st January, 1834, when the law was, that the attainder of a person abolished every inheritable quality, by which he was rendered not only incapable of himself inheriting, or transmitting his own property by heirship, but he also obstructed the descent of his lands to his posterity, in all cases where they were obliged to derive their title through him.

Grand serjeanty was another species of tenure, which some writers think was superior to knight-service, whereby the tenant was bound instead of serving the king generally in the wars, to do him some special, certain, and honorary service in person, as to be marshal of his host, or high steward of England, or to carry his banner or his sword, or to be his butler, champion, or other officer at his coronation. In most other respects it was similar to knight-service, only he was not bound to pay aid or escuage; and when tenant by knight-service paid 5*l.* for a relief, tenant by grand serjeanty paid one year's value of his land, were it much or little.

Cornage tenure was a species of grand serjeanty. The service was to wind a horn in order to warn and rouse the king's subjects to arms when the Scots or other enemies poured over the borders.

These tenures were held by personal and uncertain services, which, at length, becoming inconvenient and troublesome, were commuted into certain monetary assessments, called escuage or scutage, from scutum [Lat.], then a well-known denomination for money, as it had previously been for a shield. These scutages became the groundwork of subsidies, which were afterwards levied by our kings upon the people, to defray the expenses of their wars, out of which the land-tax of the present day sprung. Thus the gallant knight degenerated into the tame and overtaxed slave, the national militia into a band of mercenaries, and the nobles who fought for the sovereign into crafty adventurers, enriching themselves by means of systematic extortion, while, during peace, these feudal barons ravaged their neighbours, oppressed the commoners, and were, in fact, bandits and robbers.

At last these military tenures, together with all their grievances, were destroyed at the Restoration. The statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, enacted, 'that the court of awards and liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer seisins and ousterlemains, values, and forfeitures of marriage, by reason of any tenure of the king or others, be totally taken away. And that all fines for alienations, tenures by homage, knight-service, and escuage, and also aids for marrying the daughter or knighting the son, and all tenures of the king in capite, be likewise taken away. And that all sorts of tenures, held of the king or others, be turned into free and common socage, save only tenures in frankalmoign, copyholds, and the honorary services (without the slavish part) of grand serjeanty; and that all tenures which shall be created by the king, his heirs or successors, in future shall be free and common socage.'

The other subdivision of frank tenement is free socage [soca, Lat.], which, most probably, means plough-service. It is distinguished from knight-service in this respect, that it is held by a certain determinate but honorable duty; whereas, we have seen, that the tenure in chivalry or knight-service was uncertain, precarious, and indeterminate. These free socage tenures are said by the learned to be the relics of Saxon liberty, which were left untouched by the oppressive hand of the Norman.

The three species of free socage tenures are, petit serjeanty, tenure in burgage, and gavelkind.

(1) Petit serjeanty [parva serjeantia, Lat.] greatly resembles grand serjeanty, for as the latter is a personal service, the former is a rent or render, both tending to some purpose concerning the king's person. The service in petit serjeanty is the rendering annually to the king some small implement of war; as a sword, a buckler, a bow without a string, or the like. Both the tenures in serjeanty must be held from the Crown. The lands and property which were granted to the Dukes of Marlborough and Wellington for their brilliant military services are held in petit serjeanty, each rendering annually a small flag or ensign, which is deposited in Windsor Castle.

(2) Tenure in burgage [burgus, Lat.], is, where houses or lands, which were formerly the site of houses in an ancient borough, are held of some lord by a certain rent. There are a great many customs affecting these tenures, the most remarkable of which is the custom of borough-English, evidently of Saxon origin, and so named to distinguish it from the Norman customs. See BOROUGH-ENGLISH.

(3) Gavelkind [gyfe-eal-kyn, given to all the kindred]. See GAVELKIND.

The nature of these free socage tenures is feudal, and this will more plainly appear from a brief comparison of their incidents with those of tenure and chivalry. They were both held of superior lords, they were both subject to services (one being held by uncertain, the other by certain services, as we have seen), and the oath of fealty. They were subject to aids, primer seisin, marriage, and fines for alienation, all which the statute of Charles II. abolished. Free socage tenures are subject to something very similar to relief, which the ancient lawyers will not allow to be properly a relief. It is one year's rent, be the same either small or great, which the heir pays to the lord upon the death of the tenant, and this is due even though the heir be under age, which was not the case in knight-service, and the reason given is, because the lord had no wardship over him. The difference of the wardship was this: the lord never had it, because in free socage tenure, no military or other personal service being required, there was no occasion for the lord to take the profits, in order to provide a proper substitute for the infant tenant; bnt the infant's nearest relation, to whom the immediate inheritance can by no possibility descend, was the guardian in socage, and he had the custody of the land and the infant's person until he was fourteen. For instance, if the land descended from the father of the infant, his uncle by the mother's side cannot immediately inherit, and therefore he may be guardian. Our laws have deemed it proper, in order to avoid every suspicion of temptation, not to intrust the person of an infant to the custody of his possible heir. This wardship ceased at fourteen, and the heir might have ejected the guardian and called him to account for the rents and profits. He was then capable of choosing a guardian for himself, but in order to prevent an improvident choice, the 12 Car. II. c. 24 (quoted before), enacted that it should be in the power of any father by will to appoint a guardian till his child should attain twenty-one. And if no such appointment be made, the Court of Chancery will frequently interpose and appoint a guardian, to prevent an infant-heir from improvidently exposing himself to ruin.

The other great class of tenements is villenage, which is subdivided into pure and privileged villenage.

Pure villenage was the origin of the present copyhold tenures, or tenure by copy of court-roll, at the will of the lord, to understand which it is necessary to explain the origin and nature of manors.

A manor from the Norman-French word mesner, to guide, was a district of land held by a superior lord, who, keeping in his own actual occupation so much of it as was necessary for the use of his family (which part was, therefore, called terræ dominicales or demesne lands), distributed the remainder or tenemental lands among sundry tenants, who held by one of two different tenures. One of these tenures was called book-land or charter-land, which was held by deed under certain rents and free services, and was very similar to free socage lands; the other species was called folk-land, which was not held by deed, but distributed among the common people at the lord's pleasure, who might resume the occupation thereof at his discretion. These tenants, denominated serfs and villeins, and the females, neifes, were in a condition of absolute slavery, resembling the Spartan helotes, the boors in Denmark, and the traals or slaves in Sweden. The lords had the power of enfranchising them by manumission, either expressed or implied. See MANOR.

The two material elements of a manor were, therefore, demesne and services. Some part of the manor, termed the lord's waste, remained uncultivated, and was common both to the lord and his tenants. The lord of a manor was empowered to hold a court, called a court-baron, where speedy and effectual justice was administered to all the tenants. It is said by some authorities that this court is an inseparable ingredient of a manor, and that if the number of suitors should so fail as not to leave sufficient to make a jury, or homage, that is, two tenants at least, the manor itself is lost; but, by other authorities, it would seem that the manor itself may continue to exist, though the power of holding a court-baron may be gone, for want of a sufficient number of suitors. See COPYHOLD.

Thus copyhold tenures are of mean but ancient descent, for copyholders were the villeins, who by continuous encroachments upon their lords, established, at length, a customary right to their lands, which had been held absolutely at their lord's will. They now call themselves tenants by copy of court roll, because the admissions into their lands are entered on the manor rolls, and the copies of such entries are witnessed by the steward. The statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, virtually abolished tenure in villenage, but reserved copyhold, which is a mitigation of the state of villenage, for though their persons are enfranchised, their lands remain subject to the same servile conditions and forfeitures as before, though these services are almost universally commuted for pecuniary rents.

Immemorial custom is the very life of these tenures. Some customs permit the heir to succeed to the lands on his ancestor's death, when such tenures are called copyholds of inheritance; and these are liable to reliefs, escheats, wardships, and fines due on the change of the lord by death, or the change of the tenant in any way, or for a license empowering the tenant to demise or do any other act, which, without such license, would cause a forfeiture. These fines are sometimes arbitrary, and in other manors fixed by custom, but at all events they must not exceed two years' improved value of the lands, without deduction of land-tax; others are only enjoyed for life, which are subject to fealty, and services usually rendered in rents. Both species of copyholds are liable to heriots (a Danish custom, whose origin is merely conjectural). See HERIOT.

Privileged villenage, sometimes called villein-socage, is where lands have been held of the Crown from the Conquest. This is an exalted species of copyhold, held according to custom, and not according to the mere will of the lord. It is still subsisting under the name of tenure in ancient demesne, which consisted of those lands or manors that appeared in Domesday-Book, to have been actually in the possession of the Crown in the reign of Edward the Confessor or William the conqueror. These tenants, although their services were of a base original, were esteemed highly privileged villeins, for they could not be compelled to relinquish their lands at the will of their superior, et ideo dicuntur liberi. They had also a peculiar court of their own, in which to contest their rights. This tenure was not abolished by the 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Tenures in ancient demesne are of three kinds:—

(1) Tenures in ancient demesne (properly so called), which is a free holding by grant from the Crown. The tenants are bound, in respect of their lands, to perform some of the better sort of certain villein services, which are now commuted into money rents.

(2) Privileged copyholds, customary freeholds or free copyholds, are held of a manor, which is ancient demesne, according to the custom of the manor, but not of the lord's will. These lands are in fact copyholds, and therefore the term customary freeholds is not strictly correct; for although the tenants have an interest nearly as good as freehold, yet they have not a freehold interest.

(3) Copyholds of base tenure are lands of a manor, which is ancient demesne, but held merely at the lord's will.

The old Saxon ecclesiastical tenures, which were continued under the Norman Revolution, are the two following:—

(1) Frankalmoigne [libera eleemosyna, Lat., free alms], by which religious corporations and their successors for ever hold lands of the donor, without any service other than the praying for the souls of the donor and his heirs. See FRANKALMOIGNE.

A lay person cannot be a tenant in frankalmoigne. The ancient monasteries and religious houses held their land by this tenure, and so do a great many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary foundations at the present day; but the service of praying for the souls of the donors has been discontinued, and other services introduced more conformable to the doctrines of the Established Church of England.

(2) Tenure by divine service, to which is annexed some special divine service, as to sing so many masses, to distribute a certain sum in alms, &c., which were contradistinguished from free alms; for if unperformed the lord can distrain without complaining to the visitor.

The statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, excepts these spiritual tenures from abolition, so that many are now subsisting, but only the Crown can create them in the present day.

The feudal system then consolidated our English tenures, and preserved the rights of property during the chivalrous ages. This system, in order that its beneficial effects might be seen, ought to be compared with the state of society preceding it, and not with the commercial civilization of modern times. The great cause of feudality was the feeble administration of that vast and barbarous empire jumbled together by the children of Charlemagne. The confusion and anarchy arising from this overgrown and disconnected military alliance required the bands and fetters of the feudal tenure to bind the community in mutual dependence, so as to enforce the common rights and duties of social intercourse. It resisted the ambitious aim of universal despotism, and fostered, even in its slavish ceremonies, the notions of commercial liberty. History tells us that the feudal policy protected from the iron hand of the warrior the sacred institutions of civil freedom; that it restrained the desolating tyranny of the Conqueror, by interposing the barriers of a free and brave nobility, as an invincible protection to a poor and disorganized people. The spirit of liberty, and the notions of private right, can be distinctly traced in the limited services of the vassal; in the mutual obligations between the lord and his tenant; in the consent required in order to effect legislative changes; and above all, in that security which the people experienced in the administration of justice by their peers. Feudality was also a school of moral discipline. The dissolution of the Roman empire fostered the vices of falsehood, treachery and ingratitude. Now the very essence of the feudal tenure was destructive of every violation of faith, which was severely and promptly avenged, and branded by universal infamy. And the trial by peers was peculiarly calculated to promote a keener feeling, a quicker perception of moral and legal obligations. But since private wars were perpetuated by these institutions, they did not promote the peace and good order of society. The feudal system was therefore adverse to the accumulation of wealth, and the improvements of those peaceful arts which mitigate the evils and abridge the labors of mankind.

When the feudal baron first raised his banner, he lived amidst his vassals; he was their patron and defended them; but at length, by the various changes of property, and the centralization of a parliament, the baron became separated from his dependents, his protection became more fictitious than real; voluntary associations of the people were formed, and thus the force of the feudal connection became weakened.

The peaceful art of agriculture and the Roman jurisprudence preserved to us by the Pandects of Justinian materially affected the personal and civil capacities of the people, for they began to erect corporations endowed with privileges, and separate municipal governments. Hence the tyranny of the barons was opposed, and their violent system of ruling broken down. At length, commerce arose and the energy of man expanded in all its living power. Commerce, even from its dawn to the present moment, has worked wonders throughout this peopled globe. It has embellished the amenities of our social being, it has ameliorated the condition of the people, it has elevated the dignity of intellect, it has liberalised the manners of mankind. The history of commerce teems with records of these beneficent tendencies. The information gained by foreign intercourse created new thoughts, and luxury demanded new food, new pleasures. Another agent was thus evoked, and trade was the great function of correspondence. It displaced physical strength, it created mental competition, and science went into the ascendant. The fetters of feudalism were unloosed, and its vast influence was at an end, though some of its elements yet remain in a very modified state, in the laws of real property. But while we eulogise commerce, there is one evil that we are in danger of falling into. We must beware of placing in the market all the arts and sciences, the intellectual and moral attributes, as well as the produce of manufacture and agriculture. We must be cautious not to plunge ourselves altogether into the intoxicating and virtue-destroying waters of avarice!

'The feudal customs,' said Lord Kames, 'ought to be the study of every man who proposes to reap instruction from the history of modern European nations; because among these nations public transactions, not less than private property, were, some centuries ago, regulated by the feudal system. Sovereigns formerly were many of them connected by the relation of superior and vassal. The King of England, for example, by the feudal tenure, held of the French king many fair provinces. The King of Scotland, in the same manner, held many lands of the English king. The controversies among these princes were generally feudal; and without a thorough knowledge of the feudal system, one must be ever at a loss in forming any accurate notion of such controversies, or in applying to them the standard of right and wrong.'

An endeavor has thus been made to sketch briefly the effects of the feudal system upon the tenures of property. The modern freehold and copyhold tenures were severally derived in this way. From the military tenures, which were parcelled out among the martial followers of the chief, and dedicated to arms and ambition, and also from the free socage tenures, have proceeded the freeholds of the present day; while from the villenage tenures, which attached the tenants to the soil, rather by the chain of slavery than by the bond of tenure, the copyholds were derived. The main distinction between these two species of tenure is this:—Freehold property is held independently, while copyhold is held by the will of some superior lord, which will is regulated according to custom.

Tenures may be thus tabularized:—

LAY TENURES.

- (I.) Frank tenement or freehold.
  - (1) Military tenures (abolished, except grand serjeanty, and reduced to free socage tenures).
    - (1) Knight service proper, or tenure in chivalry.

Terce, thirds; dower.—Scotch term.

Terminating Building Societies, societies where the members commence their monthly contributions on a particular day, and continue to pay them until the realisation of shares to a given amount for each member, by the advance of the capital of the society to such members as required it, and the payment of interest as well as principal by them, so as to ensure such realisation within a given period of years. They have been almost superseded by Permanent Building Societies, which see.

Term fee, a certain sum charged to a suitor for each term that his cause is in the paper of business to be done.

Term in gross. See Outstanding Term.

Termor, he that holds lands or tenements for a given number of years or for life.

Terms, the times during which the superior courts at Westminster are open to all that complain of wrong, or seek their right by course of law.

There are four terms in each year, Hilary, Easter, Trinity, and Michaelmas, which see.

If a term end on a Sunday, the following Monday will be taken to be the last day. There is no provision for the case of the first day of term beginning on a Sunday, and though no judicial act can be done till the following day, Sunday will perhaps be considered the first day of term for purposes of computation.

Hilary and Trinity Terms are called issuable terms; because in them the issues are joined, and the records made up for trial at the Lent and Summer assizes; Easter and Michaelmas are the non-issuable terms.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 156.

Our university terms are different from the law terms.

Terms for years. An estate for years is denominated a term, because its enjoyment is strictly fixed, for by "term' is meant not only the interest which passes, but also the period for which it is held. It is a chattel real; chattel, because the estate passes to the owner's executors at his death, and not to his heir-at-law, and so far partakes of the nature of personalty; real, because it is an interest in land, and therefore partakes of the nature of real property. An estate for years, then, is an interest in lands, tenements, and hereditaments for an ascertained period. Every estate of a determinate duration is a term, and of the nature of a term of years, though for a less period than a year, a year being the shortest time which the law in this case takes notice of. Hence every term must have a certain beginning from which the computation is to be made, and a certain point beyond which it cannot endure. It may be made determinable on a life, or on any other contingent event, before the effluxion of the time named, as, to A. for 99 years, if B. live so long. Should B. die before the 99 years expire, the estate will cease, but though B. should survive the term, the estate, on the expiration of the 99 years, would be absolutely at an end, for the interest is an estate for years, determinable on a life.

A term is usually created by a deed or specialty contract, called a lease or demise under the common law (see Lease), and the appropriate operative verbs therein are 'demise, or grant, lease, and to farm let;' but any words showing the intent of the parties that the one (the lessor) shall divest himself of the possession, and the other (the lessee) come into it for a determinate time, are generally sufficient for the purpose.

It is usual, though not necessary, in the demise after the name of the lessee, to add the words 'his executors and administrators,' in analogy to the use of heirs in a conveyance in fee, an analogy extending so far, that where any estate is given to a person, and an estate for years to his executors by the same instrument, the latter is held to vest also in himself.

It may, however, be created by other means, as by will, or by declaration of use.

In every lease for years, there are four times to be considered:—

(1) The time of computation.

This marks the period whence the continuance of the estate is to be calculated. The time of computation may be either from —

(a) A day past; as to hold from the 25th of December last.

(β) The present time; as to hold henceforth, or from the making of the lease.

(γ) A day to come; as to hold from the 29th of next September.

(δ) An event which is to arise; as a grant to B. that when he pays 20*l*. he shall thenceforth have and occupy, &c.

(ε) It may be referred to a third person to name the time; as to hold for so many years as A. shall name.

(2) The time of commencement in interest.

This marks the time at which the lessee or termor is to have the enjoyment of the property under the lease or limitation. This time must not be beyond the period allowed by the rule preventing perpetuity; i. e. beyond a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards; but it may be made to commence in futuro, as the estate does not effect the feudal seisin, but only the possession. The times of computation and commencement may be the same, or they may be different, the first running from a day past, whilst the last begins from a day to come, which is determined by the form of the limitation. No agreement can confer a title to an estate on a tenant for any period prior to the time when he actually acquired the estate. The time of commencement in interest, or the right of enjoyment, must be either from—

(a) The time present; as to hold from a day past, or henceforth, or generally, without naming a time.

(β) A fixed future day; as to hold from the 25th of December next, or (γ) A given event, as to hold from the time of payment of 20*l*.

A lease to hold generally, without particularising any time, or from a day that is passed or henceforth, commences from the instant when the deed is delivered or other act, which evidences the lease, is perfected. When the time of commencement is to begin from the present time, or from a fixed future day, it is absolute; if it depend upon a given event, it rests upon a contingency.

The usual forms of leases limit the time according to some one of the following circumstances:—

(a) Generally, without specifying any time of computation or commencement, when the term commences from the delivery of the lease, according to the inferred intention of the parties.

(b) From the day of the date or writing, which contains the lease of the term, or some evidence thereof, or from the making or sealing of the deed, or by the word 'henceforth'— all which phrases refer to the delivery of the lease.

(c) From the day of the date, which, of course, excludes the day of the date (for the word 'from' is privative, and excludes the day), or from some day in particular.

(d) From the end of the term in particular or from the end of the time comprised in a term. The word 'term' refers to the continuance of the interest under the lease; the word 'time' to the space of the term. This distinction is important, for if a man make a lease for twenty-one years, and after make a lease to begin à fine et expiratione prædicti termini annorum dimiss. (from and after the end and expiration of the aforesaid term of twenty-one years demised), and after the first lease is surrendered, the second lease shall begin presently; but if it had been to begin post finem et expirationem prædict. 21 annorum (after the end of the said twenty-one years) in that case, although the first term had been surrendered, yet the second lease would not begin till after the twenty-one years be ended by effluxion of time, and so note the diversity between the term of twenty-one years and the time of twenty-one years.

(e) From an event, or one of several events.

When the time of computation is to run from the date of the deed, and it bears an impossible date, as the 34th day of November, or the 31st day of February, the words referring to the date will be rejected, and the time begin from the delivery of the deed. So, when a lease is made for years, to commence and be computed from the determination of a former lease supposed to be subsisting, when in truth there is no such lease, the lease thus granted will commence immediately, and the computation of the term made from the time of the delivery. But a distinction is drawn between an impossible date and one which is possible, and may happen in some year, though it will not happen in every year, as the 29th of February; in the first case, the estate commences immediately; in the last, the time referred to will happen in a Bissextile or Leap-year; the computation will then run from the first 29th of February after the making of the lease.

(3) The time of continuance.

This must be for a period of certain duration, to be calculated by a given space of time, of arithmetical import, and measured by number. It is ascertained either

(a) By an enumeration of years, months, weeks, or days;

(β) By a reference to them; or

(γ) By passing a right which before it vests

in interest is to be reduced to a certainty by a reference to these periods.

(4) The time for the determination of the estate.

This must be certain.

Terms for years are divided into three kinds: (1) absolute; (2) upon condition; and (3) with collateral determinations.

A term for years is absolute when it is for a certain and fixed number of years, without any condition or collateral determination, and is to end by effluxion of time.

A term for years upon condition may be terminated before it arrive at the period to which the limitation has extended it; ex. gra. an estate to A. for 500 years, provided that if B. should pay to A. 1,000*l.* on the 1st of next January the term shall cease. It is obvious, then, that a condition annexed to the estate, to defeat it before the end of the term by the effluxion of time, if the event pointed out by the clause of condition shall arise within the term, the estate is on condition, and not an absolute estate.

A term for years, with collateral determinations, may continue under the limitation, till the time at which the term or space for which it is granted will expire. Collateral determinations may be moulded in any manner according to the agreement of the parties. By these means that may be effected which cannot be accomplished by express and direct limitations, as is evident from the following cases:—A lease by a parson for twenty-one years determinable on his ceasing to be a parson, and a lease for so many years as he shall continue parson; and of a lease for twenty-one years, if a man shall so long live, and a lease for so many years as a man shall live, without ascertaining the number of these years.

Long terms for years, with provisions for their determination, are resorted to in marriage and other settlements, and especially in mortgage transactions.

If a term of years be created by a lease or demise operating at the common law, the lessee, before he actually enters upon the premises, has no estate, but only a right of entry or interesse termini, which is an executory interest, and is assignable.

But if the term be created by any assurance which takes effect under the Statute of Uses, the estate vests in possession, and becomes perfected without entry, at the period when it is intended to take effect. And terms created by a devise in a will do not require entry to vest them as estates.

Where a long term for years had been created for a given purpose, and that purpose had been fully accomplished, the term was, of course, fully satisfied. It should, therefore, have been merged by an assignment or surrender to the reversioner, but the practice was to keep such a term on foot, and upon a purchase or mortgage of the land, to make an assignment of such satisfied term to a trustee for the purchaser or mortgagee upon trust to protect him and his estate from all mesne or middle incumbrances, i. e. all estates and charges created intermediately between the creation of the term and the assignment of it, of which the purchaser or mortgagee had no notice at the time of his purchase or mortgage. This practice afforded a shield to purchasers, and mortgagees, who as to their loan are purchasers pro tanto. But it seemed wise to our law-makers to put an end to the system, for by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112, every satisfied term which, on the 31st December, 1845, either by express declaration or by construction of law [more correctly of equity], was attendant on the inheritance, absolutely ceased; so has every term which has been satisfied since that day, and which either by express declaration or by construction of law, has since that day become attendant on the inheritance; and so will cease every term which shall hereafter be satisfied, and so become attendant on the inheritance. With this only exception, that every term which was so attendant by express declaration on the 31st December, 1845, is to afford to every person the same protection against every incumbrance, charge, estate, right, action, suit, claim, and demand, as it would have afforded to him had it continued to subsist, but had not been assigned or dealt with after the 31st December, 1845.

The incidents to this estate are the following:—

(1) The tenant is entitled to the same estovers as a tenant for life, unless restrained by special agreement.

(2) He cannot commit any kind of waste with impunity, unless he be a tenant without impeachment of waste, when he has the same privilege as a tenant for life under similar circumstances.

(3) He is entitled to emblements where the term for years depends upon an uncertainty, or is determined by another's act, and not his voluntary conduct.

(4) His estate is first subject to the payment of debts, being part of the natural fund for such purpose.

(5) He may by deed assign his whole interest in the estate, or underlease part of it, unless restrained by condition or covenant. A surrender may either be by deed duly executed, or it may arise by operation of law, as in case of the acceptance of another interest incompatible with the first. If the tenant have underleased, he cannot, by surrendering his original lease, destroy the underlease, for it would be unjust to frustrate his own grant. But if the original lease be rendered void, by breach of any of its conditions, or an entry be made in consequence of such breach, the underlease will then be defeated; otherwise the original grantee might, by granting an underlease, deprive the original grantor of the benefit of the conditions contained in his grant.

(6) When the term for years vests in the person who is seised of the freehold, by which there is an union of the two interests in the same person at the same time, and there is no intervening estate between the term and the freehold, the term merges in the freehold and becomes extinct.

(7) The estate may be lost by fine and non-claim as to transactions affecting the title before the passing of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, and c. 27; and by merger, extinguishment, surrender, written cancellation, forfeiture incurred by non-observance of provisoes, or violation of conditions, or disclaiming the lessor's title, and naturally by effluxion of time. See PARTICULAR TENANTS, alienation by.

Termes (Les) de la Ley. See RASTELL.

Terminum, a day given to a defendant.

Terminus ad quem, the terminating point.

Terminus annorum certus debet esse et determinatus.—Co. Litt. 45.—(A term of years ought to be certain and determinate.)

Terminus a quo, the starting point.

Terminus et feodum non possunt constare simul in unâ eâdemque personâ.—Plow. 29.—(A term and the fee cannot both be in one and the same person at the same time.)

Terra, arable land.

Terra affirmata, land let to farm.

Terra boscalis, woody land.

Terra culta, cultivated land.

Terra debilis, weak or barren land.

Terra dominica, or Indominicala, the demesne land of a manor.

Terra excultabilis, land which may be ploughed.

Terra extendenda, a writ addressed to an escheator, &c., that he inquire and find out the true yearly value of any land, &c., by the oath of twelve men, and to certify the extent into the Chancery.—Reg. of Writs, 293.

Terra frusca, or frisca, fresh land, not lately ploughed.

Terra hydala, land subject to the payment of hydage.

Terra lucrabilis, land gained from the sea or enclosed out of a waste.

Terra manens vacua occupanti conceditur.—1 Sid. 347.—(Land lying unoccupied is given to the occupant.)

Terra Normanorum, land held by a Norman.

Terra nova, land newly converted from wood ground to arable.

Terra putura, land in forests, held by the tenure of furnishing food to the keepers therein.

Terra sabulosa, gravelly or sandy ground.

Terrier, or Terrar, a register or survey of land.

Terris bonis et catallis rehabendis post purgationem, a writ for a clerk to recover his lands, goods, and chattels, formerly seized, after he had cleared himself of the felony of which he was accused, and delivered to his ordinary to be purged.—Reg. Orig.

Terris et catallis tentis ultra debitum levatum, a judicial writ for the restoring of lands or goods to a debtor who is distrained above the amount of the debt.—Reg. Judic.

Terris liberandis, a writ that lay for a man convicted by attaint, to bring the record and process before the king, and take a fine for his imprisonment, and then to deliver to him his lands and tenements again, and release him of the strip and waste.—Reg. Orig. 232; also, it was a writ for the delivery of lands to the heir, after homage and relief performed, or upon security taken that he should perform them.—Ibid. 293.

Territory of a Judge, the extent of a judge's jurisdiction.

Tertius interveniens, one who voluntarily interposes in a suit depending between others, with a view to the protection of his own interests.—Civ. Law.

Test, to bring one to a trial and examination; or to ascertain the truth.

Test Act, 25 Car. II. c. 2, by which it was provided that all persons having any offices, civil or military (with the exception of some few of an inferior kind), or receiving pay from the Crown, or holding a place of trust under it, should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and also receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usage of the Church of England. The provisions of the Test Act were afterwards extended by 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 13; 2 Geo. II. c. 31; and 9 Geo. II. c. 26. The Test Act was repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 17; which also repealed the Corporation Act, 13 Car. II. st. 2, c. 1.

Testacy, leaving a will.

Testa de Nevil, an ancient document in two volumes, in the custody of the Queen's Remembrancer in the Exchequer, more properly called Liber Feodorum.

These books contain principally accounts (1) of fees holden either immediately of the king, or of others who held of the king in capite, and if alienated whether the owners were infeoffed ab antiquo or de novo, as also fees holden in frank-almoigne, with the values thereof respectively; (2) of serjeanties holden of the king, distinguishing such as were rented or alienated, with the values of the same; (3) of widows, and heiresses of tenants in capite, whose marriages were in the gift of the king, with the values of their lands; (4) of churches in the gift of the king, and in whose hands they were; (5) of escheats, as well of the lands of Normans as others, in whose hands the same were, and by what services holden; (6) of the amount of the sums paid for scutage and aid, &c. by each tenant.

These volumes were printed in 1807, under the authority of the commissioners of the records of the realm.

Testament, a disposition of personal property to take place after the owner's decease, according to his desire and direction. See WILL.

As to the modes of making a testament according to the civil law, see Sand. Just. 254, et seq. and Cum. C. L. 117.

Testamenta cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur, ultimum ratum est: sic est, cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur in eodem testamento.—Co. Litt. 112.—(When two conflicting wills are found, the last prevails: so it is when two conflicting clauses occur in the same will.)

Testamenta latissimam interpretationem habere debent.—Jenk. Cent. 81.—(Wills ought to have the broadest interpretation.

Testamentary, given by will; contained in a will.

Testamentary causes, proceedings in the Probate Court relating to the validity of wills and intestacies of personal property, over which it has acquired exclusive jurisdiction, by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77; amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95. It also has jurisdiction (not exclusive) in certain cases to inquire into the validity of wills, which concern realty as well as personalty.

Testamentary guardian, one appointed by a father's will over his child, pursuant to 12 Car. II. c. 24. See GUARDIAN.

Testamenti factio, the ceremony of making a testament, either as testator, heir, or witness. Civ. Law.

Testamentum, i. e. testatio mentis, facta nullo præsente metu periculi, sed cogitatione mortalitatis.—Co. Litt. 322.—(A testament, that is, the witnessing of the mind, made under no present fear of danger, but in expectancy of death.)

Testamentum omne morte consummatum.—Ibid.—(Every will is perfected by death.)

Testate, having made a will.

Testation, witness, evidence.

Testator, a man who makes a will or testament.

Testatoris ultima voluntas est perimplenda secundum veram intentionem suam.—Ibid.—(The last will of a testator is to be thoroughly fulfilled according to his real intention.)

Testatrix, a woman who makes a will.

Testatum, the witnessing part of a deed or agreement. See DEED.

Testatum writ, a process of execution which was issued into a different county than that in which the venue was laid in the declaration; it must have been founded on a writ ejusdem generis, issued into the county of the venue, and returned nulla bona, &c. It is abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 121. See GROUND WRIT.

Teste, the witnessing part of a writ, warrant, or other proceeding, which expresses the date of its issue.

Testes, qui postulat debet dare eis sumptus competentes.—Reg. Jur. Civ.—(Whosoever demands witnesses, must find them in competent provision.)

Testibus deponentibus in pari numero digniori-bus est credendum.—4 Inst. 279.—(Where the number of witnesses is equal on both sides, the more worthy are to be believed.)

Testimoignes, witnesses.

Testimonia ponderanda sunt, non numeranda. (Evidence is to be weighed, not enumerated.)

Testimonial, a writing produced by a person as an evidence for himself.

Testimonial proof, parol evidence.—Civ. Law.

Testimony, evidence given; proof by a witness. See PERPETUATING TESTIMONY.

Testis de visu præponderat aliis.—4 Inst. 279.—(An eye-witness is preferred to others.)

Testis lupanaris sufficit ad factum in lupanari. Moor, 817.—(A strumpet is a sufficient witness to a fact committed in a brothel.)

Testis nemo in suâ causâ esse potest.—Reg. Jur. Civ.—(No one can be a witness in his own cause.) See now 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99.

Testis oculatus unus plus valet quam auriti decem.—4 Inst. 279.—(One eye-witness is worth more than ten ear-witnesses.)

Testis should be able to say from his heart, non sum doctus nec instructus nec curo de victoriâ, modo ministretur justitia.—4 Inst. 279.—(A witness should be able to say from his heart, I am not taught nor instructed, neither do I care about the success of either party, only that justice be administered.)

Testium numerus si non adjicitur, duo sufficiunt.—Ibid.—(If the number of witnesses is not added, two suffice.)

Testmoignes ne poent testifie le negative, mes l'affirmative.—Ibid.—(Witnesses cannot witness to a negative, they must witness to an affirmative.)

Thames Embankment, from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars Bridge, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 93; 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 45, 75.

Thames Watermen. By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 75, the watermen, wherrymen, and lightermen of the Thames were consolidated into one body corporate, in the freemen and apprentices whereof is vested, subject to certain exceptions, the exclusive right of navigating that river for hire.

Thanage of the King, a certain part of the king's land or property, of which the ruler or governor was called thane.—Cowel.

Thane [fr. thegn, Sax., a servant], an Anglo-Saxon nobleman; an old title of honor, perhaps equivalent to baron. There were two orders of thanes, the king's thanes and the ordinary thanes. Soon after the Conquest this name was disused.

Thanelands, such lands as were granted by charter of the Saxon kings to their thanes with all immunities, except the trinoda necessitas.—Cowel.

Thaneship, the office and dignity of a thane; the seigniory of a thane.

Theatres. The Act for regulating theatres is the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. See 3 Step. Com. 308.

Theft, larceny, which see.

Theftbote [fr. theof, Sax., thief, and bote, compensation], compounding a felony. See COMPOUNDING.

Theftbote est emenda furti capta, sine consideratione curiæ domini regis.—3 Inst. 134.—(Theftbote is the paying money to have goods stolen returned, without having any respect for the court of the king.)

Thellusson's Act, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98. See ACCUMULATION.

Thelonio rationabili habendo, a writ that formerly lay for him that had any part of the king's demesne in fee-farm, to recover reasonable toll of the king's tenants there, if his demesne had been accustomed to be tolled.—Reg. Orig. 87.

Thelonium, an abolished writ for citizens or burgesses to assert their right to exemption from toll.—F. N. B. 226.

Thelonmannus, the toll-man or officer who receives toll.

Them, or Theme, the right of having all the generation of villeins, with their suits and cattle. Termes de la Ley.

Themmagium, a duty or acknowledgment paid by inferior tenants in respect of theme or team.—Cowel.

Theoden, an under-thane; a husbandman or inferior tenant.

Theof [prædones, Lat.], offenders who joined in a body of seven to commit depredations.—Ang.-Sax.

Theowes, Theowmen, or Thews, slaves, captives, or bondmen.—Spelman on Feuds, cap. 5.

Thesaurus, Thesaurium, the treasury.

Thesaurus competit domino regi, et non domino libertatis, nisi sit per verba specialia.—Fitz. Corone. 281.—(A treasure belongs to the king and not to the lord of a liberty, unless it be through special words.)

Thesaurus inventus, treasure-trove, which see.

Thesaurus inventus est vetus dispositio pecuniæ, &c., cujus non extat modo memoria, adeo ut jam dominum non habeat.—3 Inst. 132.—(Treasure-trove is an ancient hiding of money, &c., of which no recollection exists, so that it now has no owner.)

Thesaurus non competit regi, nisi quando nemo scit qui abscondit thesaurum.—Ibid.—(Treasure does not belong to the king, unless no one knows who hid it.)

Thesaurus regis est vinculum pacis et bellorum nervus.—Godb. 293.—(The king's treasure is the bond of peace and the sinew of wars.)

Thesmothete, [fr. θεσμοθέτης, Gk.], a law-maker; a law-giver.

Thethinga, a tithing.

Thigsters, a sort of gentle beggars.—Scotch word.

Thingus, a thane or nobleman; knight or freeman.

Things, the subjects of dominion or property as distinguished from persons. They are distributed into three kinds: (1) things real or immovable, comprehending lands, tenements, and hereditaments; (2) things personal or movable, comprehending goods and chattels; and (3) things mixed, partaking of the characteristics of the two former, as a title-deed, a term for years. The civil law divided things into corporeal (tangi possunt), and incorporeal (tangi non possunt).

Thirdborough, an under constable.

Thirdings, the third part of the corn growing on the land, due to the lord for a heriot on the death of his tenant, within the manor of Turfat in Hereford.—Blount.

Third-night-awn-hinde [trium noctium hospes, Lat.]. By the laws of St. Edward the Confessor, if any man lay a third night in an inn, he was called a third-night-awn-hinde, and his host was answerable for him if he committed any offence. The first night, forman-night, or uncuth (unknown), he was reckoned a stranger; the second night, twa-night, a guest; and the third night, an agenhinde, a domestic.—Bract. l. 3.

Third Penny. See DENARIUS TERTIUS COMITATUS.

Thirlage, a servitude or tenure in Scotland, by which the possessor of certain lands is bound to carry his grain to a certain mill to be ground, for which he is bound to pay a portion of the flour or meal, varying from a thirtieth to a twelfth part, which is termed multure. This servitude is now commuted for an annual payment in grain, by 39 Geo. III. c. 55.

This day six months, or three months, fixing 'this day six months or three months' for the next stage of a bill, is one of the modes in which the House of Lords and the House of Commons reject bills of which they disapprove. A bill rejected in this manner cannot be reintroduced in the same session. See AVOIDANCE OF A DECISION.

Thistle take. It was a custom within the manor of Halton, in Chester, that if, in driving beasts over a common, the driver permit them to graze or take but a thistle, he shall pay a halfpenny a piece to the lord of the fee. And at Fiskerton, in Nottinghamshire, by ancient custom, if a native or a cottager killed a swine above a year old, he paid to the lord a penny, which purchase of leave to kill a hog was also called thistle-take.—Cowel.

Thornton (C. J.), author of a summa or abridgment of Bracton, containing most of the titles of the law in a concise form. Though a professed epitomiser, he omits many things in that author, and does not adhere to his method. 2 Reeves, c. xi., p. 281.

Thorp, Threp, Trop [villa, vicus, Lat.], either in the beginning or end of the names of places, means a street or village.

Thrave, or Threave [Nor.-Fr.], twenty-four sheaves or four shocks of corn; a certain quantity of straw; also a herd, a drove, a heap.

Threatening Letters. By 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 16, 'Whosoever shall maliciously send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing threatening to kill or murder any person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years, and not less than three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement; and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping.'

By 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 44, 'Whosoever shall send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing demanding of any person, with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any property, chattel, money, valuable security or other valuable thing, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement; and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping.'

By 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 45, 'Whosoever shall with menaces or by force demand any property, chattel, money, valuable security, or other valuable thing, of any person, with intent to steal the same, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement.'

'Whosoever shall send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing, accusing or threatening to accuse any other person of any crime punishable by law with death or penal servitude for not less than seven years, or with any assault with intent to commit a rape, or of any infamous crime as hereinafter defined, with a view or intent in any of such cases to extort or gain by means of such letter, or writing, any property, chattel, money, valuable security, or other valuable thing, from any person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement; and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping; and the abominable crime of buggery committed either with mankind or with beasts, and every assault with intent to commit the said abominable crime, and every attempt or endeavor to commit the same abominable crime, and every solicitation, persuasion, promise or threat offered or made to any person whereby to move or induce such person to commit or permit the said abominable crime, shall be deemed to be an infamous crime within the meaning of this Act' (s. 46).

As to threatening to publish, or offering to abstain from publishing a libel with intent to extort money, &c., see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.

Threats, or menaces of bodily hurt, through fear of which a man's business is interrupted, are civil injuries affecting the right of personal security. The remedy for this species of injury is in pecuniary damages.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, 'Whosoever shall accuse, or threaten to accuse, either the person to whom such accusation or threats shall be made, or any other person, of any of the infamous or other crimes, lastly hereinbefore mentioned (see s. 46), with the view or intent, in any of the cases last aforesaid, to extort or gain from such person so accused or threatened to be accused, or from any other person, any property, chattel, money, valuable security, or other valuable thing, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor; and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (s. 47).

'Whosoever, with intent to defraud or injure any other person, shall, by any unlawful violence to, or restraint of, or threat of violence to or restraint of the person of another, or by accusing, or threatening to accuse any person of any treason, felony or infamous crime, as hereinbefore defined, compel or induce any person to execute, make, accept, indorse, alter, or destroy, the whole, or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress, or affix his name or the name of any other person or of any company, firm, or co-partnership, or the seal of any body corporate, company, or society, upon or to any paper or parchment, in order that the same may be afterwards made or converted into, or used, or dealt with as a valuable security, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without solitary confinement' (s. 48).

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 50, 'Whosoever shall send, deliver, or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing threatening to burn or destroy any house, barn, or other building, or any rick or stack of grain, hay, or straw, or any such agricultural produce in or under any building, or any ship or vessel, or to kill, maim, or wound any cattle, shall be guilty of felony,' and being convicted, is liable to the same punishment.

Tithe Commissioners for England and Wales. This Board is consolidated with that of the Inclosure Commissioners, and that of the Copyhold Commissioners.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; continued by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 53. See 25 & 26 Vict. c. 72.

Tithe Commutation Acts, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 71, amended by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 69; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 64; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 15; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 54; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 73; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 104; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 93.

Tithe-free, exempted from the payment of tithes.

Tither, one who gathers tithes.

Tithes [fr. teotha, Sax.], a species of incorporeal hereditaments, being the tenth part of the increase yearly arising and renewing from the profits of lands, the stock upon lands and the personal industry of the inhabitants; the first species being usually called prædial, the second mixed, the third personal.

The following persons are exempt from the payment of tithes by personal privilege: the sovereign, rectors, vicars. All spiritual persons and corporations have been always capable of having their lands discharged of tithes in various ways—as by real composition, by the pope's bull of exemption, by unity of possession, by prescription, by virtue of their order. All persons spiritual and lay may claim an exemption from tithes, either partial or total, by a real composition, or a partial exemption by custom (see MODUS) or by long usage, in pursuance of 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 100.

Tithes are now commuted into a rent-charge, the amount of which is annually adjusted, according to the average price of corn. See TITHE COMMUTATION ACTS.

The commutation may be effected in one of two ways; either by a voluntary parochial agreement, confirmed by the commissioners, or by the compulsory award of the commissioners. The value, either voluntarily agreed upon or awarded by the commissioners, is to be considered as the amount of the total rent-charge to be paid in respect of the tithes in that parish, and to be afterwards apportioned among the lands of that parish, having regard to their average titheable produce and productive quality; and after the apportionment shall have been confirmed, such lands are to be absolutely discharged from the payment of all tithes, and instead thereof, shall be subject to their portion of the rent-charge which shall be thenceforth payable to the former tithe-owner, by two half-yearly payments, which are to fluctuate according to the price of corn. An advertisement is inserted by authority in the London Gazette, in January in every year, stating the average price of wheat, barley, and oats, for seven years, ending on Thursday before Christmas then next preceding; every rent-charge then is deemed of the value of as many bushels of wheat, barley, and oats, in equal quantities, as it would have been competent to purchase according to the prices contained in such advertisement; and after every first of January it varies so as always to consist of the price of the same quantities, according to the advertisement then next preceding.

A tithe rent-charge varies in amount, and no person is personally liable to its payment, thus differing from a rent-charge generally. When the rent-charge is in arrear for twenty-one days, the remedy is by distress on the land, as in the case of landlord and tenant; but if it be in arrear for forty days, and there be no sufficient distress, a writ may then be obtained from one of the judges at Westminster to assess the arrears, after which the owner of the rent-charge may sue out a writ of execution for taking possession of the lands, and holding them till his debt and costs be fully satisfied. But neither a distress nor writ of execution can be resorted to for more than two years' arrears at any one time.

In some cases lands may obtain an exemption under the Commutation Acts from all liability either to tithe or rent-charge. For to the extent of twenty acres in the same parish, land is allowed to be given to the tithe-owner as an equivalent; and any person seised in possession of an estate in fee-simple, or fee-tail, of any tithe or rent-charge, may dispose of the same so that it shall be merged in the inheritance of the land charged.—3 Step. Com. 79–84; 2 Hall. M. A., c. vii., pt. 1, p. 144.

Tithing, the number or company of ten men, with their families, knit together in a society, all of them being bound to the king for their peaceable and good behaviour, the chief of whom was the tithing-man (toothing-man).—Cowel.

Tithing-man, a peace-officer, an under constable.

Tithing-penny. See TEDING-PENNY.

Title, a general head, comprising particulars; an appellation of honor or dignity; a claim of right. It is the means whereby an owner possesses his property justly, or the evidence of ownership.

As to title to realty:—

There are several stages and degrees requisite to form a complete title to lands and tenements.

The lowest and most imperfect degree of title consists in the mere naked possession, or actual occupation of the estate, without any apparent right or any shadow of pretence of right to hold and continue such possession.

The next step to a good and perfect title is the right of possession, which may reside in one man, while the actual possession is in another.

The last step is the right of property (jus proprietatis), without either possession or even the right of possession. This is frequently styled mere right (jus merum), and the estate of the owner is in such cases said to be totally divested and put to a right.

It is the union of these three degrees, viz.: actual possession, right of possession, and right of property, which forms a complete title to lands, tenements and hereditaments. See DROIT-DROIT.

There are three modes of acquiring a title to realty:—

(1) By operation of law.

(2) By purchase, as distinguished from law, and

(3) By law and purchase.

Title by operation of law is either by (a) descent, or (b) prescription.

Title by purchase is either by (a) forfeiture, or (b) alienation.

Title by law and purchase is by escheatage.

The text-writers give occupancy, which is described as the taking possession of property, which did not at the time belong to anybody; but this is now entirely exploded.—1 Vict. c. 26, ss. 3, 6. In the mining districts of Derbyshire and Cornwall, by the Stannary Laws, an estate in mines might, and it is believed still may, be gained by occupancy.—Geary v. Bancroft, 1 Sid. 347.

The principal circumstances in drawing conclusions as to title to be attended to, are—

1st. That there is a deduction of title to the legal estate for a period of sixty years;

2ndly. That the legal estate can be obtained free from any equities affecting it;

3rdly. That all the particular estates either are determined, or can be conveyed to the purchaser or his trustee;

4thly. That no reversion or remainder is outstanding in the Crown, or in any stranger; and 5thly. That there are not any incumbrances by way of condition, or limitation over, mortgages, Crown-debts, judgments, statutes, decrees, lites pendentes, annuities, rents, legacies, portions, charges, dower, courtesy, forfeitures, leases, &c., or any outstanding term of years, which the purchaser cannot procure either to be extinguished or assigned.

There are at least three species of doubtful titles: 1st, where the title is doubtful by reason of some uncertainty in the law itself; 2ndly, where the doubt is as to the application of some settled principle or rule of law; and 3rdly, where a matter of fact upon which a title depends is either not in its nature capable of satisfactory proof, or, being capable of such proof, is yet not satisfactorily proved.

It may be safely asserted that there is no defect which more frequently renders it impossible for a person who has a good title to prove it, or enables a party who has a bad title fraudulently to exhibit a colorable ownership than the want of evidence of the identity of the parcels.

A good title is produced whenever it appears that upon certain acts being done, the legal and equitable estates in the property contracted for will become vested in the purchaser, those acts being such as the vendor can either himself perform or cause to be performed.

The title to things personal may be acquired or lost by—(1) Occupancy. (2) Invention. (3) Prerogative. (4) Forfeiture. (5) Custom. (6) Succession. (7) Marriage. (8) Judgment. (9) Gift of grant. (10) Contract. (11) Bankruptcy or insolvency. (12) Testament. (13) Administration. See DECLARATION OF TITLE.

Title of clergymen, some certain place where they may exercise their functions; also, an assurance of being preferred to some ecclesiastical benefice.

Title to Lands, document of. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, 'Whosoever shall steal, or shall for any fraudulent purpose, destroy, cancel, obliterate, or conceal the whole or any part of any document of title to lands shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement' (s. 28).

The term, 'document of title to lands,' includes any deed, map, paper, or parchment, written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, being or containing evidence of the title, or any part of the title, to any real estate, or to any interest in or out of real estate (s. 1).

Title-deeds, the muniments or evidences of ownership. See TITLE TO LANDS, DOCUMENT OF.

Titulars of Erection, persons who, after popery was destroyed in Scotland, became entitled to the parsonage-tithes which had fallen to monasteries, in right of several parishes that had belonged to them in mortmain. They are the same as impropriators in England.

Titulus est justa causa possidendi id quod nostrum est; dicitur à tuendo, quia per illum, possessor defendit terram: et plerumque constat ex munimentis, quæ muniunt et tuentur causam.—8 Co. 153.—(A title is the just right of possessing that which is our own; it is called from defence [tuendo], because by it the possessor defends his land; and it generally consists of muniments which fortify and protect the right.)

Toalia, a towel. There is a tenure of lands by the service of waiting with a towel at the king's coronation.

Tobacco Duties Act, 26 Vict. c. 7.

Tobago and Trinidad. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 22.

Toft, a place where a messuage has stood.—Cowel.

Toftman, the owner or possessor of a toft.

Togati, Roman advocates.

Token, a sign of the existence of a fact; also, private money.

Toleration Act, 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 18, confirmed by 10 Anne, c. 2, by which all persons dissenting from the Church of England (except Papists and persons denying the Trinity) were relieved from such of the acts against Nonconformists as prevented their assembling for religious worship according to their own forms, or otherwise restrained their religious liberty, on condition of their taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribing a declaration against transubstantiation; and in the case of dissenting ministers, subscribing also to certain of the Thirty-nine Articles. The clause of this Act, which excepted persons denying the Trinity from the benefits of its enactments, was repealed by 53 Geo. III. c. 160.

Toll [fr. tollo, Lat.], to bar, defeat, or take away, as to toll an entry is to deny and take away the right of entry. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Toll [fr. tol, Sax. and Dut.; told, Dan.; toll, Wel.; taille, Fr.], an excise of goods; a seizure of some part for permission of the rest.

It has two significations:—

(1) A liberty to buy and sell within the precincts of the manor, which seems to import as much as a fair or market.

(2) A tribute or custom paid for passage.—Cowel.

Tollage, any custom or imposition.

Tollbooth, a prison, a custom-house, an exchange; also the place where goods are weighed.

Tolldish, a vessel by which the toll of corn for grinding is measured.

Toller, one who collects tribute or taxes.

Tollgatherer, the officer who takes or collects toll.

Toll-thorough, when a town prescribes to have toll for such a number of beasts, or for every beast that goes through the town, or over a bridge or ferry belonging to it.—Com. Dig. tit. 'Toll' (C).

Toll-traverse, or Travers, toll taken for every beast driven across a man's land. He may prescribe and distrain for it viâ regiâ.—Cro. Eliz. 710.

Tolsester, an old excise; a duty paid by tenants of some manors to the lord for liberty to brew and sell ale.

Tolsey, the same as Tollbooth, which see. Also, a place where merchants meet; a local tribunal held at the Guildhall, Bristol.

Tolt, a writ whereby a cause depending in a court-baron was taken and removed into a county-court.—O. N. B. 4.

Tolta, wrong, rapine, extortion.

Ton, twenty hundred weight of 112 lbs. avoirdupois each.

Tonnage, the number of tons burden that a ship will carry.

Tonnage duties, those imposed on wines imported, according to a certain rate per ton. This, with poundage, was formerly granted to the sovereign for life by Acts of Parliament, usually passed at the beginning of each reign; but by 9 Anne, c. 6; 1 Geo. I. c. 12; and 3 Geo. I. c. 7, they were made perpetual, and mortgaged for the public debt.

Tontine, a life-annuity, or a loan raised on life-annuities, with benefit of survivorship. The term originated from the circumstance that Lorenzo Tonti, an Italian, invented this kind of security in the seventeenth century, when the governments of Europe had some difficulty in raising money in consequence of the wars of Louis XIV., who first adopted the plan in France. A loan was obtained from several individuals on the grant of an annuity to each of them, on the understanding that, as deaths occurred, the annuities should continue payable to the survivors, and that the last survivor should take the whole. This scheme was adopted by other nations as well as France, but was not introduced into England until recently, and then only for the purpose of raising money to carry private speculations into effect, which could not be satisfactorily accomplished without a combination of capital. As to the formation of such a scheme, see Stone's Benefit Build. Soc. 78.

Tools, Exportation of. This was formerly a criminal offence, but is no longer so, since the restrictions upon trade are removed.—4 Step. Com. 346 n.

Top annual, an annual rent out of a house built in a burgh.

Tora Garas Huk, an annual payment or rent-charge of a fixed nature on a village jampa, made by the Bombay Government through their collectors in the different zillahs of Guzerat. The names of the recipients of such rent-charges, with the amounts paid to them, are entered in the collector's book, and the payments are made according to such entries out of the monies received by such collector.—Indian.

Torra [fr. tor, Sax.], a mount or hill.

Tort [fr. tortus, Lat.], injury or wrong. See ACTION.

Tort à le ley est contrarie.—Co. Litt. 158.—(Tort is contrary to the law.)

Tortfeasor, a wrongdoer; a trespasser.

Tortious, anything done by wrong; an act involving a forfeiture of property.

Torture. See RACK.

Tory, originally a nickname for the wild Irish in Ulster. Afterwards given to, and adopted by, one of the two great parliamentary parties which have alternately governed Great Britain since the Revolution of 1688. See WHIG.

Totidem verbis [Lat.] (in so many words).

Toties quoties (as often as a thing shall happen).

Totted, a good or sperate debt to the Crown.

Totum præfertur unicuique parti.—3 Co. 41.—(The whole is preferable to any single part.)

Toujours et encore presz [Nor.-Fr.] (always and still ready).

Tourn, the sheriff's tourn or rotation. See SHERIFFS' TOURN.

Tout temps presz et encore est [Nor.-Fr.] (always was and is at present ready).

Towage, money paid for towing.

Town [fr. tun, Sax.], a tithing or vill; any collection of houses larger than a village.

Towns are either corporate, that is, having a corporation to transact their business, or not corporate. Some have the liberty or franchise of a market, others have not. Towns are usually divided into cities, boroughs, or common towns.

Town Clerk, an officer who manages the public business of a place.

Town Crier, an officer in a town, whose business it is to make proclamations.

Town-house, the hall where the public business of a town is transacted.

Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89.

Township, the corporation of a town; the district belonging to a town.

Toxical, poisonous; containing poison.

Toxicology [fr. τοξικόν, Gk., poison, and λόγος, discourse], the science of poisons.

Tractent fabrilia fabri.—3 Co. Epist.—(Let smiths perform the work of smiths.)

Trade [fr. tratta, Ital.], traffic; commerce; exchange of goods for other goods, or for money. All wholesale trade, all buying in order to sell again by wholesale may be reduced to three sorts: the home trade, the foreign trade of consumption, and the carrying trade.—2 Smi. Wealth of Nat. b. 2, c. v.

Offences against trade are—

(1) Smuggling.
(2) Frauds by bankrupts and insolvents.
(3) Cheating.
(4) Monopoly.

Trade Marks, Fraudulent. 'The Merchandise Marks Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 88, some of the provisions of which did not come into operation until after December 31, 1863, contains in substance the following provisions. It makes it a misdemeanor to forge or counterfeit any trade mark (defined by the 1st section), or falsely to apply any such trade mark, with intent to defraud, to any article, or to any cask, bottle, stopper, vessel, case, cover, wrapper, band, reel, ticket, label, or any other thing in or with which any commodity is sold, or intended to be sold (ss. 2, 3). It is an offence for anyone to sell or expose, either for sale or for any purpose of trade or manufacture, articles with forged or false trade marks attached, the penalty being the forfeiture of a sum of money equal to the value of such articles, and a sum, besides, not exceeding 5*l.* nor less than 10*s.* (s. 4). Every addition to and every alteration and imitation of any trade mark made, applied, or used, with intent to defraud, are to be deemed forgeries (s. 5). It is made obligatory on every person who shall sell an article having a false trade mark to give information, on a demand in writing being made upon him, as to where he procured it; and power is given to justices of the peace to summon parties refusing or neglecting to afford such information; and, in the event of their persisting in their neglect or refusal, to impose a penalty of 5*l.* (s. 6). To mark any false indication of quantity upon an article with intent to defraud is made punishable by a penalty equal to the value of the article and the payment of an additional sum not exceeding 5*l.* and not less than 10*s.* (s. 7). Selling or exposing for sale articles with false statements of quantities, &c., is an offence punishable with a penalty of not more than 5*l.* or less than 5*s.* (s. 8). It is not to be an offence to apply names or marks generally used for indicating particular classes or descriptions of manufacture (s. 9). Section 10 relates to the description of trade marks, &c. in indictments. A conviction under the powers of the Act is not to affect any right or civil remedy to which any person aggrieved may be entitled at law, in equity, or otherwise (s. 11); nor in any indictment, information, or proceeding under its provisions need an intent to defraud any person in particular be alleged or proved (s. 12). Persons aiding in the commission of misdemeanors under the Act are also guilty of misdemeanors (s. 13). The punishment on conviction of any offence which by the Act is made a misdemeanor is to be, at the discretion of the court, imprisonment for not more than two years, with or without hard labor, or by fine, or both by imprisonment with or without hard labor and fine, and also by imprisonment until the fine (if any) shall have been paid and satisfied (s. 14). The time within which any action or proceeding may be commenced for the recovery of penalties or procuring a conviction is limited to three years next after the commission of the offence, or one year after its first discovery by the person proceeding (s. 18). The vendor of an article with a trade mark is to be deemed to warrant or contract with the vendee that the mark is genuine, unless the contrary shall be expressed in some writing signed by or on behalf of the vendor, and delivered to and accepted by the vendee (s. 19). The vendor of an article with a description upon it of its quantity is to be deemed to contract and warrant that the description is true, unless, as before, the contrary shall be expressed in writing delivered to and accepted by the vendee (s. 20). In suits at law or in equity against persons for using forged trade marks the court may not only order the article to be destroyed, but may by injunction command the defendant to forbear from repeating the offence upon pain of contempt of court (s. 21). Persons aggrieved by forgeries may recover damages against the guilty parties (s. 22). A plaintiff suing for a penalty under the Act may be compelled to give security for costs, and a defendant, in case of judgment going in his favor, is to have a full indemnity for costs (ss. 23, 24). The Act is not in any way to affect the rights and privileges of the Corporation of Cutlers, of Hallamshire, in the county of York, nor to repeal or make void any of the provisions of the statute 59 Geo. III. c. 7, which regulates the cutlery trade in England (s. 25).

Trader, one engaged in merchandise or commerce.

Tradesman, a shopkeeper.

Trading or farming, by clergymen, prohibited by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, ss. 28–30.

Traditio loqui facit chartam.—5 Co. 1.—(Delivery makes the deed speak.)

Tradition, the act of handing over; delivery.

Trailbaston, Court of, erected by Edward I., by the statute of Ragman. This was a commission of oyer and terminer of an unusual kind, and was issued in the fulness of zeal for the correction of public disorders. The rigor, however, with which this was executed creating some discontents, it was thought expedient, in course of time, to discontinue it.—2 Reeves, p. 277.

TrainBands, the militia; the part of a community trained to martial exercises.

Training military, without full authority, illegal, by 60 Geo. III. & 1 Geo. IV. c. 1.

Traitor [fr. traditor, Lat.], one who, being trusted, betrays; one guilty of treason.

Traitorously, in a manner suiting traitors; perfidiously; treacherously.

Traitress, a woman who betrays.

Transcript, a copy; anything written from an original.

Transcriptio pedis finis levati mittendo in Cancellarium, a writ which certified the foot of a fine levied before justices in eyre, &c. into the Chancery.—Reg. Orig. 669.

Transcriptio recognitionis factæ coram justiciariis itinerantibus, &c. an old writ to certify a recognizance taken by justices in eyre.—Reg. Orig. 152.

Transfer, to convey; to make over from one to another; to remove.

Transference, the name of an action by which a suit, which was pending at the time the parties died, is transferred from the deceased to his representatives, in the same condition in which it stood formerly. If it be the pursuer who is dead, the action is called a transference active; if the defender, it is a transference passive.—Scotch Law.

Transfer of Land Act. To facilitate the proof of title to, and the conveyance of, real estates, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, was passed. The Act is confined to England, and is divided into four parts. Part I. is headed 'As to the Registration of Real Estates and the Title thereto.' It establishes a registry, which is to be confined to a registration of the titles to estates of freehold tenure, and leasehold estates in freehold lands. Applications for registry may be made by:—

(1) The owner of the fee-simple.
(2) Persons who collectively are the owners of the fee-simple, or have the power of acquiring the same.
(3) Persons who have the power of appointing the fee-simple.
(4) Trustees for sale of the fee-simple.
(5) The owner of the first estate of freehold and first vested estate of inheritance.
(6) Any purchaser of a fee-simple, where his contract empowers him so to do, or the vendor consents.
(7) Any person authorized by the Court of Chancery to make such application. Application may be made though the estate be subject to encumbrances (ss. 1-4). No title shall be accepted for registration as indefeasible, unless it shall appear to be such as a court of equity would hold to be a valid marketable title (s. 5). Any question that may arise as to any matter of title may be referred to a judge of the Court of Chancery (s. 6). If the title shall appear to be good and marketable, the applicant shall furnish to the registrar, and he shall examine and settle for the purposes of registration: (1) an exact description of the lands; (2) a statement of the persons interested, and their interests; (3) a statement of the incumbrances (s. 7). The registrar may require the description to be verified by oath (s. 8). The mines and minerals if not expressly mentioned shall be deemed not to be included (s. 9). The identity of the parcels shall be established, and the registrar shall make inquiries, and except in the case of incorporeal hereditaments, a map shall be deposited (s. 10). If satisfied with the title, the registrar is to require notice to be given by public advertisement of his intention to register the land with an indefeasible title at the expiration of a period not exceeding three months (s. 11). A copy of the notice, containing a description of the land and of the applicants, is to be served upon every adjoining occupier and person interested, &c., stating place, time, and manner of showing cause (s. 12). Any person may show cause before the registrar against the registration, or claim that it shall be subject to conditions or reservations. The registrar may decide or refer to the judge, and if he decide, either party may appeal (s. 13).

If no sufficient cause is shown, the registrar shall complete the registration by entering (1) in a book called 'The Register of Estates with an Indefeasible Title' the description of the estate, with a map or plan annexed, and shall distinguish the estate by a number or numbers; and the entry shall refer to another book entitled 'The Record of Title to Lands on the Registry;' and (2) in the Record of Title book, under the same number or numbers, a concise record of the existing estates and interests in the land, and persons interested; and (3) in a book entitled the 'Register of Mortgages and Incumbrances' under the same number or numbers, an account of all charges and incumbrances (s. 14). Subject to general orders, the books may be inspected by the owners or incumbrancers, but by no other person except by order of the court (s. 15). The registrar may specify any exception, qualification, or condition, or reserve a right, or describe any outstanding right or possibility. If there is a disputed question of boundary, either party may object to its being decided by the registrar or by the Court of Chancery, under this Act (s. 16). Doubtful and disputed questions arising in making up or continuing the record may be referred to a judge of the Court of Chancery (s. 17). Deeds, wills, and other instruments may be referred to instead of being set out in the record; but copies thereof must be deposited in the registry, and such copies shall be conclusive evidence of the contents (s. 18). The names of the persons entitled to moneys under a trust for sale, or a trust estate or term, need not be entered, but the trustee's estate shall be described (s. 19). It is declared that persons described in the record of title shall be deemed to have the property therein named absolutely and indefeasibly subject to such exceptions or qualifications as are mentioned in the record of title (s. 20). Irregularities, &c., in previous proceedings, do not vitiate the record of title (s. 21). Before final registration, the applicant and his solicitor or agent are to make oath, that all deeds, charges, incumbrances, and material facts have been to the fullest extent of their respective knowledge made known to the registrar (s. 22), who may call for further evidence, or refuse to register (s. 23), and he may also demand security for costs (s. 24).

As to registration without an indefeasible title, application may be made by any person; but: (1) He shall prove actual enjoyment as owner in fee for the last ten years. (2) The last deed or will (if any) shall be produced; an applicant heir shall evidence his ancestor's seisin. (3) The above rules as to the description of the land, and ascertaining its accuracy and that of the boundaries, shall apply. (4) A statutory declaration shall be made by the applicant, his solicitor or agent, or certificated conveyancer, that the applicant (subject as may be stated) is well entitled in fee. (5) The registrar shall in the record define when the indefeasible title shall attach; then the judge, if there be no other objection, after notices, as in indefeasible title, shall direct a transfer to the indefeasible register, and thereupon the registrar shall make up a proper record, and the applicant and other persons named in it have the same estates, rights, and privileges, as if the land had been registered with an indefeasible title. (6) Subject to the Act, registration without indefeasible title shall not prejudice any interests existing before the registration (s. 25). Leasehold estates where fifty years of the term demised is unexpired, or where two lives are subsisting, may be registered with an indefeasible title in like manner as freeholds (s. 26).

The following charges and liabilities are not to be deemed incumbrances under this Act, viz. (1) land-tax succession duty, tithe rent-charges, rents payable to the Crown; (2) public rights of way, liability to repair highways by reason of tenure, rights of way, watercourses and rights of water and other easements or servitudes, rights of common, manorial rights and franchises; (3) leases or agreements for leases not exceeding twenty-one years, where there is an actual occupation under the same; but where they exist the registrar shall notice them, as he may think fit, in the register (s. 27). Land entered on the register may, at the option of the proprietor, be registered as one estate or separate estates (s. 28). Notice of any legal condition, e. g. that the land may not be built upon, shall be entered in the record of title, and any transfer shall be subject to such condition. The Court of Chancery may discharge, alter, or modify any such condition (s. 29). Notice of registration shall be given by the registrar to persons entitled to any charge or incumbrance, the owner of which has not had notice of the application (s. 30). Any person obtaining a declaration under the Declaration of Title Act may be entered on the record accordingly, and the land thenceforth shall be subject to this Act (s. 31). After the registration every estate or interest, right or title coming into existence (except as excepted in the Act), shall be entered or noticed in the record of title, or register of incumbrances (s. 32). Subject to the Act, the estates of registered proprietors shall be subject to the existing law, and may be dealt with according to it (s. 33). With the consent of all parties on the register, the land may be withdrawn from it (s. 34).

Caveat.—A person entitled to object to a disposition of land without his consent may lodge a caveat that he is entitled to notice of any application for registration, supporting it by affidavit (ss. 35 & 36).

Notice on the cautioner may be served personally, or through the post (s. 37). Ten days' notice is necessary (s. 38). A person wrongfully lodging a caveat is liable to such damages as the Court of Chancery shall deem just (s. 39). A caveat is not to prejudice any person's claim or title (s. 40).

Part II. is entitled Simplification of Titles by Judicial Sales. It provides that after a due examination of the title, sales of estates may be authorized by the Court of Chancery, and the payment of the purchase money into court is to exonerate the purchaser from all further liability (ss. 41–62).

Part III. relates to the transfer of registered land. It provides that all registered land, and every part thereof, may be conveyed, settled, charged, dealt with, or affected in or by any of the following modes or dispositions: that is to say, first, by a statutory disposition in any of the forms sanctioned by this Act; secondly, by endorsement on the land certificate; thirdly, by deposit of the land certificate; fourthly, by any deed, will, judgment, decree, or instrument, by which such land, if not registered, might now, according to law, be conveyed, charged, settled, devised, dealt with, or affected, but no equitable mortgage is to be created by a deposit of title-deeds (s. 63). The attendance at the registry and the forms of conveyance are prescribed in 64 to 67. The registrar is to deliver, on request, to the owner of an estate a land certificate, containing a description of the lands with all the entries relating thereto; a copy of the entries relating to the lands appearing in the record of title; and a copy of the entries in the registry of incumbrances. The certificate to state whether such lands are registered with or without an indefeasible title (s. 68); ss 69-88 contain various other provisions respecting land certificates and their effect. Every land certificate shall be evidence of the matters therein contained (s. 71). Estates described in such certificate may be conveyed or charged by endorsement in a prescribed form (s. 72); and the deposit of a certificate is to create a lien in the same way as the deposit of title deeds (s. 73). The following clauses relate chiefly to the forms of proceeding, but by s. 88 it is enacted that no dealing with registered land is to be valid until the stamp and ad valorem duties are paid.

Part IV. contains General Provisions to facilitate Registration. These provisions enable the judges in Chancery to decide upon questions relating to money charges, incumbrances, &c. (89–92). A registered proprietor may place certain restrictions on the transfer or conveyance of the lands so as to prevent its being done without due notice to such persons as he may direct (s. 93). By s. 108 and the following clauses, an office of land registry is established and regulated. There is to be a registrar with not more than three assistants, examiners of titles, clerks, messengers, &c., to be paid by the Treasury.

Then follow general provisions specifying forms and giving the Lord Chancellor and the registrar power to frame general orders and to determine the amounts of fees, &c. Any person fraudulently procuring, or assisting to procure, or who is privy to the fraudulent procurement of any order, or the entry of any caveat, or notice of a charge, or of the erasure or alteration on the register of any caveat or notice of a charge, shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and any order procured by such fraud is to be deemed null and void (s. 138). If convicted of the misdemeanor the punishment is to be imprisonment with or without hard labor for a term not exceeding three years, or a fine as the court may think fit (s. 139). It is important to observe, where land situate in the counties of Middlesex and York has been put upon the register under this Act, whilst it remains thereon the provisions of the Acts of Parliament relating to registries in those counties cease to be applicable (s. 104). See General Rules and Orders of the Office of Land Registry, October 1, 1862; and see Gough's Land Registry Manual.

Transferree, the person to whom a transfer is made.

Transferror, the person who makes a transfer.

Transferuntur dominia sine titulo et traditione, per usucaptionem, scil. per longam continuam et pacificam possessionem.—Co. Litt. 113.—(Right of dominion are transferred without title or delivery, by usucaption, to wit, long and quiet possession.)

Transgressio est cum modus non servatur nec mensura, debet enim quilibet in suo facto modum habere et mensuram.—Co. Litt. 37.—(Transgression is when neither mode nor measure is preserved, for every one in his act ought to have a mode and measure.)

Transgressione multiplicatâ, crescat pœnæ inflictio.—2 Inst. 479.—(Where transgression is multiplied, let the infliction of punishment be increased.

Transgressione, a writ or action of trespass.

Transhipment, the taking of the cargo out of one ship, and loading another with it.

Transire, a warrant or permit from the custom-house to let goods pass.

Transitory actions, the opposite to local actions, which see.

Transitu, stoppage in. See STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

Translation, the removing from one place to another; the removal of a bishop to another diocese. As to copyright in translated books, see 2 Step. Com. 42.

Transportation, the banishing or sending away a criminal into another country; also, the carriage of property.

This punishment was introduced in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 39 Eliz. c. 4. The word is first used in the 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 23. The punishment was chiefly regulated by 5 Geo. IV. c. 84.

Returning from transportation before the expiration of the term of punishment was an offence against public justice, and punishable by transportation for life.—4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 67. This punishment has been superseded for penal servitude by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3.

Transumpts, judicial copies of rights to certain lands.—Scotch term.

Traverse, the denial of some matter of fact alleged in a pleading, whether at common law, in equity, or in criminal prosecutions.

Of traverses there are several kinds, but the most ordinary is the common traverse, which consists of a tender of issue, i. e. of a denial, accompanied with a formal offer of the point denied for decision, and the denial that it makes is by way of express contradiction, in terms of the allegation traversed. The common traverse is not invariably a negative, for if opposed to a precedent negative allegation, it will, of course, be in the affirmative. There is also a sort of traverse, somewhat in the style of the old general issue, as non est factum, never indebted, ne disturba pas, which see, under their appropriate heads.—Step. Plead. 170.

Traverse of an office, proof that an inquisition made of lands or goods by the escheator is defective and untruly made.

Traversing indictment, postponing the trial of it.

The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 16, repeals 60 Geo. III. and 1 Geo. IV. c. 4, as to the traverse of indictments in cases of misdemeanor, and provides, by s. 27, that no person prosecuted shall be entitled to traverse or postpone the trial of any indictment found against him at any session of the peace, session of oyer and terminer, or session of gaol delivery: provided always, that if the court, upon the application of the person so indicted or otherwise, shall be of opinion that he ought to be allowed a further time, either to prepare for his defence or otherwise, such court may adjourn the trial of such person to the next subsequent session, upon such terms as to bail or otherwise as to such court shall seem meet, and may respite the recognizances of the prosecutor and witnesses accordingly; in which case the prosecutor and witnesses shall be bound to attend and prosecute and give evidence at such subsequent session, without entering into any fresh recognizance for that purpose.

Traversing note. In equity, a plaintiff, after an appearance has been entered by or for a defendant defending in person, or by a solicitor, but not otherwise, to a bill, may, in default of answer to which interrogatories have been filed for the examination of such defendant, proceed with his cause by filing a traversing note as to such defendant. A traversing note appears in practice to be required in all cases where a defendant has been served with interrogatories to answer, and has not answered, before a certificate to set down the cause can be obtained. It is, however, unnecessary to file a traversing note in order to set down a cause or motion for a decree, although interrogatories may have been filed by the plaintiff, if the time for answering such interrogatories have expired, and no replication have been filed.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 338.

Traversum, a ferry.

T. R. E., the initials of the phrase, tempore regis Edwardi.

Treacher, Treachetour, or Treachour, a traitor.

Treadmill, an instrument of prison discipline. It is composed of a large revolving cylinder, having ledges or steps fixed round its circumference; the prisoners walk up these ledges, and their weight revolves the cylinder.

Treason [fr. trahir, Fr., to betray; proditio, Lat.], or leze-majesty, an offence against the duty of allegiance, and the highest known crime, for it aims at the very destruction of the commonwealth itself. There are ten species of treason, five of which are declared by 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, as follows:—

(1) When a man doth compass or imagine the death of our lord the king (a queen regnant is within these words), of our lady his queen, or of their eldest son and heir.

(2) If a man do violate the king's companion (i. e. his wife), or the king's eldest daughter unmarried, or the wife of the king's eldest son and heir.

(3) If a man do levy war against our lord the king in his realm. (After a battle has taken place, it is termed, bellum percussum; before it, bellum levatum.)

(4) If a man be adherent to the king's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid or comfort in the realm or elsewhere.

(5) If a man slay the chancellor, treasurer, or the king's justices of the one bench or the other, justices in eyre or justices of assize, and all other justices assigned to hear and determine, being in their places doing their offices.

The following species have been created by subsequent statutes:—

(6) If any person shall endeavor to deprive or hinder any person, being the next in succession to the crown, according to the limitations of the Act of Settlement (12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2), from succeeding to the crown, and shall maliciously and directly attempt the same by any overt act.—1 Anne, st. 2, c. 17, s. 3.

(8) The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 52, s. 4, provides (having reference to the contingency of any issue of Her present Majesty ascending the throne while under the age of eighteen), that every person who shall be aiding or abetting in obtaining, or bringing about any marriage to, as well as any person so marrying, such issue under the age of eighteen, without the consent in writing of the Regent, and the assent of both Houses of Parliament previously obtained, shall be guilty of treason.

(9) If any person within this realm or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend to deprive or depose the Queen from the crown, or to levy war within this realm, in order by force to compel her to change her measures or counsels, or to intimidate either House of Parliament, or to excite an invasion of any of Her Majesty's dominions, and shall express, utter, or declare such intentions by publishing any printing or writing, or by open and advised speaking, or by any overt act, shall be guilty of felony. This was formerly a species of treason, pursuant to 36 Geo. III. c. 7, and 57 Geo. III. c. 6, which were repealed by 11 Vict. c. 12.

(10) Misprision or bare concealment of treason.—1 & 2 P. & M. c. 10.

The offence of treason must be prosecuted within three years from its commission, if committed within the realm, except in the case of a designed assassination of the sovereign.—7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 3. Information for open and advised speaking must be given within six days after its utterance, and a warrant for the apprehension of the offender must have been issued within ten days after and within two years from April 22, 1848.—11 Vict. c. 12, s. 4.

The punishment of a convicted traitor is—1st, that the offender be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution; 2nd, that he be hanged by the neck until he be dead; 3rd, that his head be severed from the body; 4th, that his body be divided into four quarters; 5th, that his head and quarters shall be at the disposal of the Crown. The sovereign may, however, change the whole sentence into beheading. A traitress is to be drawn to the place of execution, and hanged by the neck until she be dead.—4 Step. Com.; 2 Reeves, p. 451; and Foster's Crim. L. 183–251.

Treasonable, having the nature or guilt of treason.

Treasurer, one who has the care of money or treasure.

There was a Lord High Treasurer of England, but the duties are now executed by commissioners. The Prime Minister generally fills the office of First Lord of the Treasury.

Treasurer of a county, he that keeps the county stock. There are two of them in each county, chosen by the major part of the justices of the peace, &c. at the Easter-sessions; they must have 10*l.* a year in land, or 150*l.* in personal estate, and shall not continue in their office above a year; they are to account yearly at the Easter-sessions, or within ten days after, to their successors under penalties. There are treasurers of the county-courts.

Treasurer's Remembrancer, he whose charge was to put the Lord Treasurer and the rest of the judges of the Exchequer in remembrance of such things as were called on and dealt in for the sovereign's behoof. There is still one in Scotland.

Treasure-trove [thesaurus inventus, Lat.], money or coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion found hidden in the earth or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown or unfound, in which cases it belongs to the Crown. Bracton defines it, vetus depositio pecuniæ.

Concealing treasure-trove is punishable by fine or imprisonment.

Coroners ought to inquire of treasure-trove, being certified thereof.—4 Edw. I. st. 2. See Sand. Just. 200.

Treasury, the place where treasure is deposited.—Cowel.

Treasury-bench, the front seat on the right-hand of the Speaker of the House of Commons, upon which the members of the ministry who have seats in that house sit.

Treating Act. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 4, amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, and continued by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 109, and amended and continued by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, enacts that every candidate at an election, who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person, to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, and shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, with full costs of suit. And every voter who shall corruptly accept or take any such meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, shall be incapable of voting at such election, and his vote, if given, shall be utterly void, and of none effect. As to the origin of treating at elections, see 3 Hall. Const. Hist. c. xxi., p. 302, n. g.

Treaty, negotiation, act of treating, a compact between nations.

It is the sovereign's prerogative to make treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign states and princes.

Treble costs. See DOUBLE OR TREBLE COSTS.

Treble damages. See DOUBLE OR TREBLE DAMAGES.

Trebucket, a tumbrel, castigatory, or cucking-stool. See CASTIGATORY.

Treet [fr. triticum, Lat.], fine wheat.—51 Hen. III.

Tremagium, Tremesium, Termisium, the season or time of sowing summer-corn, being about March, the third month, to which the word may allude.

Tremellum, a granary.

Tresayle, an abolished writ sued on ouster by abatement, on the death of the grandfather's grandfather.

Trespass [fr. transgressio, Lat.], any transgression of the law, less than treason, felony, or misprision of either.

The action of trespass lies where a person claims damages for trespass committed against him. A trespass is an injury committed with violence, and this violence may be either actual or implied; and the law will imply violence, though none is actually used, where the injury is of a direct and immediate kind, and committed on the person or tangible and corporeal property of the plaintiff. Of actual violence, an assault and battery is an instance; of implied, a peaceable but wrongful entry upon the plaintiff's lands.—Step. Plead. 16. As to trespass on the case, see CASE.

Trespass quare clausum fregit, an entry on another's land without lawful authority, for which injury an action will lie.—2 Selw. N. P. 1295–1326.

Trespasser, one who commits a trespass.

Trestornare, to turn or divert another way. Cowel.

Tret. See TARE.

Trethings [fr. trethu, Welch, to tax], taxes, imposts.

Treyts, taken out or withdrawn, as withdrawing or discharging a juror.

Tria genera sunt executorum:—(1) A lege constitutus, et ideo dicitur legitimus: ut episcopus. (2) A testatore constitutus, et ideo dicitur testamentarius, ut executor. (3) Ab episcopo constitutus, et ideo dicitur dativus; ut administrator.—Swinb. p. 4, s. 3.—(There are three sorts of executors:—(1) Such a one as the law itself constitutes, and therefore called legitimate, viz. a bishop. (2) Such a one as is appointed by the testator, and thence called testamentary, viz. an executor. (3) Such a one as the bishop appoints, called thence dative, viz. an administrator.) See PROBATE COURT.

Trial, the examination of a cause, civil or criminal, before a judge who has jurisdiction over it, according to the laws of the land.—1 Inst. 124.

Trial list, a catalogue of causes for trial.

Tria sequuntur defamatorem famosum; pravitatis incrementum: bursæ decrementum: conscientiæ detrimentum.—5 Co. 126.—(Three things follow a noted defamer: the increase of crime; the decrease of purse; and the injuring of conscience.)

Triatio ibi semper debet fieri, ubi juratores meliorem possunt habere notitiam.—7 Co. 1.—(Trial ought to be had always there where the jury can have the best knowledge.)

Tribunal, the seat of a judge, a court of justice.

Tribute, payment made in acknowledgment; subjection.

Tricesima, an ancient custom in a borough in the county of Hereford, so called, because thirty burgesses paid 1*d.* rent for their houses to the bishop, who was lord of the manor.—Lib. Nig. Heref.

Tridingmote, the court held for a triding or trithing.

Triennial Elections Act, 6 W. & M. c. 2, prolonged to seven years, by 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 38.

Triens, a third part; also dower.

Trinepos, the male descendant in the 6th degree in direct line.—Civ. Law.

Trinity House, a society at Deptford Strond, incorporated by Henry VIII. in 1515, for the promotion of commerce and navigation, by licensing and regulating pilots, and ordering and erecting beacons, light-houses, buoys, &c.

The Trinity House is empowered, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, to appoint and license pilots for the following limits:—(1) 'The London District,' comprising the waters of the Thames and Medway, as high as London Bridge and Rochester Bridge respectively, and also the seas and channels leading thereto or therefrom, as far as Oxfordness to the north, and Dungeness to the south; so, nevertheless, that no pilot shall be hereafter licensed to conduct ships both above and below Gravesend. (2) 'The English Channel District,' comprising the seas between Dungeness and the Isle of Wight. (3) 'The Trinity House Outports Districts,' comprising any pilotage-district for the appointment of pilots, within which no particular provision is made by Act of Parliament or charter. And, in general, the employment of pilots, in the first and third of these districts, is compulsory. But the following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London District, and the Trinity House Outports Districts. (1) Ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom. (2) Ships of no more than sixty tons burthen. (3) Ships trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne. (4) Ships from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, which are wholly laden with stone, the produce of those islands. (5) Ships navigating within the limits of the ports to which they belong. (6) Ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages between two places, both situate out of such limits, and not being bound to any place within such limits nor anchoring therein (ss. 369–388).

Trinity Term, an issuable term, beginning on the 22nd May, and ending on the 12th of June. See EASTER TERM.—Wheat. Com. Pr. 241.

Trinobantes, Trinonantes, or Trinovantes, inhabitants of Britain, situated next to the Cantii northward, who occupied, according to Camden and Baxter, that country which now composes the counties of Essex and Middlesex, and some part of Surrey. But if Ptolemy be not mistaken, their territories were not so extensive in his time, as London did not then belong to them. The name seems to be derived from the three following British words:—Tri, now, hant, i. e. inhabitants of the new city (London).—Encyc. Lond.

Trinoda necessitas. Under this denomination are comprised three distinct imposts, to which all landed possessions, not excepting those of the church, were subject, viz.:—

(1) Bryge-bót, for keeping the bridges and high roads in repair.—(Pontis constructio.)

(2) Burg-bót, for keeping the burgs or fortresses in an efficient state of defence.—(Arcis constructio.)

(3) Fyrd, or contribution for maintaining the military and naval force of the kingdom.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Triors, Triours, or Triers, such as are chosen by the court to examine whether a challenge made to the panel of jurors, or to any of them, be just or not.

Tripartite, divided into three parts, having three correspondent copies; a deed to which there are three distinct parties.

Triplicatio, a rebutter.

Tristis, a forest immunity.—Manw. p. 1, 86.

Tritavia, a great-grandmother's great grandmother; the female ascendant in the 6th degree.—Civ. Law.

Tritavus, a great-grandfather's great-grandfather; the male ascendant in the 6th degree. Ibid.

Trithing, the third-part of a shire or province; a riding.

Trithing-reeve, a governor of a trithing.

Triumvir, a trithing man or constable of three hundred.

Triverbial days [dies fasti, Lat.], judicial days, when the courts are open for business.

Tronage, a customary duty, or toll for weighing wool.

Tronator, a weigher of wool.

Trophy money, money formerly collected and raised in London, and the several counties of England, towards providing harness, and maintenance for the militia, &c.

Trover [fr. trouver, Fr., to find], a special action upon the case, which may be maintained by any person who has either an absolute or special property in goods, for recovering the value of such goods, against another, who having or being supposed to have obtained possession of such goods by lawful means, has wrongfully converted them to his own use. In order to maintain an action of trover, it is necessary that it should appear: (1) That the plaintiff had either an absolute or special property in the goods, which are the subject of the action. (2) That the plaintiff had the right of possession in the goods. (3) That the goods are the subject-matter of the action. (4) That the defendant has been guilty of a wrongful conversion.

Troy weight [pondus Trojæ, Lat.], a weight of twelve ounces to the pound, having its name from Troyes, a city in Aube, France.

Truce, a league or cessation of arms.

Truchman, an interpreter.

Truck system, the payment of wages in goods instead of money. The plan has been for masters to establish warehouses or shops, and the workmen in their employ have either had their wages accounted for to them by supplies of goods from such depôts, without receiving any money, or they have had the money given them with an express understanding that they were to resort to the warehouses or shops of their masters for the articles of which they stood in need. This system was abolished by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. cc. 36, 37. See Archer v. James, 31, L. J. (Q. B.) 153.

True bill [billa vera, Lat.], the endorsement which the grand jury makes upon a bill of indictment when, having heard the evidence, they are satisfied of the truth of the accusation.

Trustee, one entrusted with property for the benefit of a cestui que trust, which see.

Any trustee, executor, or administrator shall be at liberty, without the institution of a suit, to apply by petition to any judge of the High Court of Chancery, or by summons upon a written statement to any such judge at chambers, for the opinion, advice, or direction, of such judge on any question respecting the management or administration of the trust property or the assets of any testator or intestate, such application to be served upon, or the hearing thereof to be attended by, all persons interested in such application, or such of them as the said judge shall think expedient; and the trustee, executor, or administrator acting upon the opinion, advice, or direction given by the said judge shall be deemed as far as regards his own responsibility, to have discharged his duty as such trustee, executor, or administrator in the subject-matter of the said application; provided nevertheless that this Act shall not extend to indemnify any trustee, executor, or administrator in respect of any act done in accordance with such opinion, advice, or direction, as aforesaid, if such trustee, executor, or administrator shall have been guilty of any fraud or wilful concealment or misrepresentation in obtaining such opinion, advice, or direction; and the costs of such application as aforesaid shall be in the discretion of the judge to whom the said application shall be made.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 30; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 9.

Trustee Acts, for the appointment of new trustees, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 10; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, ss. 17, 36. As to gratuitous trustees in Scotland, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 84; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 115.

Trustee Relief Acts, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 74.

Trustees, fraudulent, Punishment of. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 80, it is enacted, that 'Whosoever, being a trustee of any property for the use or benefit, either wholly or partially for some other person, or for any public or charitable purpose, shall, with intent to defraud, convert or appropriate the same or any part thereof to or for his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than such person as aforesaid, or for any purpose other than such public or charitable purpose as aforesaid, or otherwise dispose of or destroy such property or any part thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to any of the punishments which the court may award as hereinbefore last mentioned, i. e. penal servitude for any term not more than seven nor less than three years; or imprisonment for not more than two years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement. Provided that no proceeding or prosecution for any offence included in this section shall be commenced without the sanction of Her Majesty's Attorney-General, or in case that office be vacant, of Her Majesty's Solicitor-General; provided also that where any civil proceeding shall have been taken against any person to whom the provisions of this section may apply, no person who shall have taken such civil proceeding shall commence any prosecution under this section without the sanction of the court or judge before whom such civil proceedings shall have been had or shall be pending.'

Truster, the creator of a trust.

Trusts. A trust is simply a confidence, reposed either expressly or impliedly in a person, (hence called the trustee), for the benefit of another (hence called the cestui que trust, or beneficiary), not, however, issuing out of real or personal property, but as a collateral incident accompanying it, annexed in privity to (i. e. commensurate with) the interest in such property, and also to the person touching such interest, for the accomplishment of which confidence, the cestui que trust or beneficiary has his remedy in equity only; the trustee himself likewise being aided and protected in the proper performance of his trust, when he seeks the court's direction as to its management.

Every kind of property in which a legal interest may be given, whatever may be its quantity or quality, if it will yield a profit, may be impressed with a trust, which equity will carry out without regard to form, provided its purpose do not contravene the policy of the law, or the principles governing the rights of property; for qui hæret in literâ hæret in cortice.

Trusts may be classed thus:—

(I.) Express, divided into—

(a) Trusts executed, perfect, complete, or constituted.

(b) Trusts executory, imperfect, incomplete, or directory.

(II.) Arising by operation of law, divided into—

(a) Constructive.

(b) Resulting.

(c) Implied.

Trusts are also divisible into (1) permanent, when there is a continuing duty to be performed for the benefit of several persons in succession, and (2) temporary, when there is one particular duty only to perform. Again, trusts may be general, where a trustee's duty is passive; and special, where it is active.

A trust, being in contemplation of equity, the substantial ownership of property, its legal possessor can create a trust in relation thereto, co-extensive with his ability to dispose of it at law.

The Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 7, requires that 'all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences of any lands, tehements, or hereditaments shall be manifested and proved by some writing, signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust, or by his last will in writing, or else they shall be utterly void and of none effect.' This provision does not include declarations of trusts affecting chattels personal, which may be created by parol, provided they are to take effect during the life of their creator.

Since it is not necessary that a trust be declared in writing, but only so manifested and proved, no form is requisite either as regards the nature of the instrument or the language, the statute will be satisfied if the trust can be established by any subsequent acknowledgment of the trustee, however informally or indirectly made, as by a letter under his hand, by his answer to a bill in Chancery, or by a recital in a deed, provided it relate to the subject-matter, and the precise nature and object of the trust can be ascertained. A trust cannot be engrafted upon a will unless by a testamentary or codicillary paper executed with the statutory formalities, but if a devise or bequest of the legal estate be accompanied with any mala fides in the devisee or legatee, as if there be an express or implied undertaking to execute the intent of making a provision for third persons, the court will certainly establish such a trust.

A trust may be declared either directly or indirectly:—

To create a trust by a direct or formal declaration, a person need only make his meaning clear as to the interest he intends to give, without regarding the technical terms of the common law in the limitation of legal estates. An equitable fee may be granted without the word 'heirs,' and an equitable entail without the words 'heirs of the body;' but, though technical terms be not absolutely necessary, yet no rule is better established than that where technical terms are employed, they shall be taken in their legal and special sense. A distinction, however, must be drawn between trusts executed and trusts executory.

A constructive trust is properly a trust declared by a person indirectly, and construed by the court in favor of the intention. Thus when property is given absolutely to any person, and he is recommended, or entreated, or wished, by the donor having power to command, to dispose of such property in favor of another, the recommendation, entreaty, or wish creates a trust, provided the words are so used that, upon the whole, they ought to be construed as imperative; and also provided that the subject of the recommendation or wish, as well as the objects or persons intended to have the benefit of such recommendation or wish, be certain and definite. There is not any inclination to extend the rule of construction, which gives an imperative effect to precatory or recommendatory words.

Where, from the different parts of the instrument, it appears that the words are expressive of a mere expectation or wish, no trust will arise; as where the words are, that the donee will be kind to, or remember certain objects or classes, or the like; or where the donor uses such expressions as trusting to the justice of his successors, and it is to be collected that it is their own sense of justice on which he relies. When the testator recommends, but adds that he does not absolutely enjoin, it is clear that the expressions are to be taken as precatory only and not imperative. If it appear from the context that the first taker was intended to have a discretionary power to withdraw the whole or any part of the subject from the object of the wish or request, or if there are any words by which it is expressed or from which it can be implied that the first taker may apply any part of the subject to his own use, it will not be held that a trust is created.

If a testator in one part of his will give property unfettered, the legatee is not generally bound to comply with a subsequent recommendation. So, where a father devised an estate to his daughter, as a reward for her affectionate, unwearied, and unexampled attention to him, superadded words of recommendation were held not to create a trust.

In recommendatory trusts, if the words for any reason do not amount to a trust, or the intended trust fail in the whole or in part, the absolute interest remains in the donee; or if the trust established do not exhaust the property given, the donee retains, in virtue of the gift, so much of the property as is not affected with the trust; but if property be given to a person as trustee only, if no trust be declared, or the trust declared or purporting to be declared, should fail, then there is a resulting trust for the donor or those claiming under him, and the donee can claim nothing beneficially, nothing being given to him but as trustee.

Any person may be appointed a trustee, except an alien (who can, however, be a trustee as to personal estate) and a criminal attainted. A corporation may be constituted a trustee of personalty and also of realty upon charitable trusts; but not upon private trusts, by reason of the statutes of mortmain. Equity will, however, supply a trustee where realty is so devised to a corporation. It is never advisable to select a married woman to be a trustee, on account of her inability to join in the requisite assurances without her husband's concurrence; nor should an infant be appointed a trustee, on account of his legal disability. If a trust involve the receipt and custody of money, the safeguard of at least two trustees ought rarely to be dispensed with.

In order to vest the legal estate of a simple trust in a trustee, it should be conveyed or devised 'to the trustee and his heirs to the use of the trustee and his heirs,' or 'unto and to the use of the trustee and his heirs,' then superadding the trusts. Should, however, the trusts be special, imposing an agency upon the trustee, then by a limitation to A. and his heirs, upon trust to pay the rents or to permit and suffer a person to receive and take the net rents and profits, or to convey the estate; or if any control is to be exercised, or duty to be performed, as upon trust to apply the rents to a person's maintenance, or in making repairs, or to hold for the separate use of a feme covert, or to permit a feme covert to receive the profits for her separate use, or to preserve contingent remainders, and à fortiori to raise a sum of money, or to dispose of by sale, the operation of the statute of uses is effectually excluded, and the trustee takes the legal estate. But if the trust is simply to 'permit and suffer A. to receive the rents,' or the legal estate be limited to the trustees charged with debts, and subject thereto in trust for A., and no direction is given to the trustees personally to pay the debts, then as the trustees have no agency assigned to them, but merely stand seised in trust, the statute of uses will operate, and execute the possession in A.

Any person who can purchase and hold a legal estate may become a beneficiary of the equitable interest in property.

A trust will be enforced wherever there is a valuable consideration; but, if it be merely voluntary, the equitable interest will not be enforced, unless an actual trust be created, and no act remains to be done to complete the title of the trustees, for then a consideration is not essential. An agreement founded on a meritorious consideration (i. e. a secondary valuable consideration, as in favor of a wife or children), will not be executed as against the settlor himself, but as between parties claiming under the settlor, if the court can act in favor of the meritorious consideration without inflicting a hardship on persons peculiarly entitled to protection, the voluntary agreement will in such a case be specifically executed.

The rule is to carry into effect the object proposed by the trust, unless it is in contravention of the public policy of the law; as, for instance, seeking to create a perpetuity, or accumulating annual income beyond the statutory limits.

Tub, 60 lbs. of tea.

Tub-man, a barrister who has a pre-audience in the Exchequer, and also a particular place in court.

Tumbrell, a castigatory, or dung-cart.

Tumultuous petitioning. By 13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 5, it is enacted, that not more than twenty names shall be signed to any petition to the Crown, or either house of parliament, for any alteration of matters established by law in Church or State: unless the contents thereof be previously approved, in the country by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at the assizes or quarter-sessions; and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; and that no petition shall be delivered by a company of more than ten persons, on pain, in either case, of incurring a penalty not exceeding 100*l.* and three months' imprisonment. See 57 Geo. III. c. 19, s. 23; 4 Step. Com. 335.

Tun, four hogsheads.

Tuncaw, Tunkha, an assistant of the revenue for personal support or other purposes.—Indian.

Tungreve, a town-reeve or bailiff.

Turbary [fr. turbus, or turba, obs. Lat., turf, or Saxon, meaning either the right of taking turf, or the ground whence it is taken], the liberty of digging turf.

Turn, or Tourn, the great court-leet of the county, as the old county-court was the court-baron; of this the sheriff is judge, and the court is incident to his office; wherefore it is called the sheriff's tourn; and it had its name originally from the sheriff's making a turn of circuit about his shire, and holding this court in each respective hundred.—2 Hawk. P. C. c. x.

Turned to a right, where a person's possession of property cannot be restored by entry, but can only be recovered by action, it is said to be turned to a right.

Turner's (Sir George) Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, ss. 12 & 14.

Turnkey, a gaoler.

Turnpike-roads, ways maintained out of tolls paid by passengers. These do not generally fall within the operation of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50, but are regulated, primarily, by the local Acts relative to each particular road, which, though temporary, are renewed by the legislature from time to time as they are about to expire; and, in the next place, by statutes of a general description, applicable (with very few exceptions) to all turnpike-roads, that is, all roads maintained by tolls, and placed under the management of trustees or commissioners for a limited period of time.—Northam Bridge and Road Company, v. London and Southampton Railway Company, 6 M. & W. 428. The general Turnpike Acts are 3 Geo. IV. c. 126; 4 Geo. IV. c. 95; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 24; 9 Geo. IV. c. 77, s. 19; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 25; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 124; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 80; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 81; 4 & 5 Vict. cc. 33, 51. And as to South Wales, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 91; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 61; and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 72. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 33, s. 81; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 58, provide for mortgages of turnpike-tolls; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 33; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 51; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 102; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 12; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 9; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 80; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 33; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 70, provide for relief of insolvent turnpike-trusts. And see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 63; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 51; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 83; 25 & 26 Vict. cc. 56, 72; and 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 78, 94, 98.

Turpis causa, a base or vile consideration on which no action can be founded.

Turpis est pars quæ non convenit cum suo toto.—Plow. 161.—(That part is bad which accords not with its whole.)

Tuta est custodia quæ sibimet creditur.—Hob. 340.—(That guardianship is secure which is entrusted to itself alone.)

Tutelage, guardianship; state of being under a guardian.—Sand. Just. 136.

Tutius erratur ex parte mitiore.—3 Inst. 220. (It is safer to err on the gentler side.)

Tutius semper est errare acquitando quam in puniendo, ex parte misericordiæ quam ex parte justitiæ.—H. H. P. C. 290.—(It is always safer to err in acquitting than in punishing: on the side of mercy than of strict justice.)

Tutorship, the office and power of a tutor.

Tutor, a guardian; a protector; an instructor.

Tutrix, a female tutor.

Twanight gëste, a guest at an inn a second night.

Twelfhindi, the highest rank of men in the Saxon government, who were valued at 1,200*s.* If any injury were done to such persons, satisfaction was to be made according to their worth.

Twelvemonth (sing.), a year; but twelve months (plur.) are computed according to twenty-eight days for each month.—6 Rep. 62.

Twyhindi, the lower order of Saxons, valued at 200*s.* in the scale of pecuniary mulcts inflicted for crimes.

Ubi damna dantur, victus victori in expensis condemnari debet.—2 Inst. 289.—(Where damages are given, the losing party should be condemned in costs to the victor.)

Ubi eadem ratio, ibi eadem lex; et de similibus idem est judicium.—7 Co. 18.—(Where the same reason exists, there the same law prevails; and of things similar, the judgment is similar.)

Ubi factum nullum, ibi sortia nulla.—4 Co. 43.—(Where there is no deed, there can be no consequences.)

Ubi jus, ibi remedium.—Co. Litt. 197 b.—(Where there is a right there is a remedy.)

Ubi lex aliquem cogit ostendere causam, necesse est quod causa sit justa et legitima.—2 Inst. 269.—(Where the law compels a man to show cause, it is incumbent that the cause be just and legal.)

Ubi lex est specialis, et ratio ejus generalis, generaliter accipienda est.—2 Inst. 43.—(Where the law is special, and the reason of it general, it ought to be taken as being general.)

Ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus.—7 Co. 5.—(Where the law makes no distinction, we ought not to make any.)

Ubi major pars est, ibi totum.—Moor. 578.—(Where the greater part is, there the whole is.)

Ubi non est annua renovatio, ibi decimæ non debent solvi.—(Where there is no annual renovation, there tithes should not be paid.)

Ubi non est cogendi auctoritas, ibi non est parendi necessitas.—Dav. 69.—(Where there is no authority to compel, there is no necessity to obey.)

Ubi non est directa lex, standum est arbitrio judicis, vel procedendum ad similia.—Ellesm. Postn. 41.—(Where there is no direct law, the opinion of the judge is to be taken, or references to be made to similar cases.)

Ubi non est lex, ibi non est transgressio, quoad mundum.—4 Co. 16.—(Where there is no law there is no transgression, as far as relates to society.)

Ubi non est principalis non potest esse accessorius.—4 Co. 43.—(Where there is no principal there cannot be an accessary.)

Ubi nullum matrimonium, ibi nulla dos.—Co. Litt. 32.—(Where there is no marriage there is no dower.)

Ubi quid generaliter conceditur, inest hæc exceptio, si non aliquid sit contra jus fasque.—10 Co. 78.—(Where a thing is conceded generally this exception arises, that there shall be nothing contrary to law and right.)

Ubi quis delinquit, ibi punietur.—6 Co. 47.—(A person shall be punished where he commits an offence.)

Ubiquity, omnipresence; being present everywhere at the same moment.

Udal, allodial, which see.

Ukaas, or Ukase, a Russian law or ordinance.

Ullage [fr. uligo, Lat., ooziness], the quantity of fluid which a cask wants of being full, in consequence of the oozing of the liquor.—Malone.

Ulnage, alnage, which see.

Ulna ferrea, the standard ell of iron, kept in the Exchequer for the rule of measure.—Mon. Angl. ii. 383.

Ultimatum, or Ultimation, the last offer; concession or condition.

Ultima voluntas testatoris est perimplenda secundum veram intentionem suam.—Co. Litt. 322.—(The last will of a testator is to be fulfilled according to his true intention.)

Ultima voluntas esset libera.—(A last will should be free.)

Ultimum supplicium, the last or extreme punishment; death.

Ultimus hæres, the last or remote heir; this is the sovereign who succeeds, failing all relations.

Ultra posse non est esse: et vice versâ.—Wing. Max.—(What is beyond possibility cannot exist: and so contrariwise.)

Ultra vires [Lat.] (beyond their powers), said of a company when exceeding the authority imparted to it by Act of Parliament.

Umpirage, friendly decision of a controversy; arbitration.

Umpire [fr. imperator or impar, odd, Lat.]. A submission to arbitration usually provides, that in case of arbitrators not agreeing in an award, the matters should be decided by a third person, who is called an umpire. The submission either provides that the arbitrators shall appoint the umpire, or he is named therein. This appointment should always be made a condition precedent to the proceeding at all in the reference. The appointment of an umpire must be the act of the will and concurring judgment of both the arbitrators. The umpire's authority commences when arbitrators are unable to agree, but if there be a time limited for the award, his authority absolutely commences from such time. The umpire, when called upon to act, is generally invested with the same powers as the arbitrators, and bound by the same rules, and has to perform the same duties.

Unalienable, a thing which cannot be sold.

Una persona vix potest supplere vices duarum. 7 Co. 118.—(One person can scarcely supply the places of two.)

Unâ voce [Lat.] (with one voice, i. e. unanimously).

Unceasesath [fr. ceas, Sax., prosecution, un, without, and ath, oath], an oath by relations not to avenge a relation's death.—Blount.

Unclaimed dividends in the public funds, see 56 Geo. III. c. 60; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 62. As to Ireland, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 71.

Uncle and Nephew. A nephew, the son of a deceased elder brother, is preferred in the inheritance to his uncle, a younger brother of the deceased.

Uncore prist, the plea of a defendant in nature of a plea in bar, where, being sued for a debt due on bond at a day past, to save the forfeiture of the bond, he says that he tendered the money at the day and place, and that there was none there to receive it, and that he is also still ready to pay the same.

Uncuth [Sax.], unknown.

Unde nihil habet. See DOWER.

Under Chamberlains of the Exchequer, two officers who cleaved the tallies written by the clerk of the tallies, and read the same, that the clerk of the pell and comptrollers thereof might see their entries were true. They also made searches for records in the treasury, and had the custody of Domesday-Book. Abolished.

Under-lease, a grant by a lessee to another of a part of his whole interest under the original lease, reserving to himself a reversion; it differs from an assignment, which conveys the lessee's whole interest, and devolves upon the assignee the responsibility of the covenants in the original lease.

Under-sheriff [sub vicecomes, Lat.], the sheriff's deputy. See SHERIFF.

Under-tenant, one who holds by under-lease, from a lessee.

Between the original lessor and an under-tenant there is neither privity of estate nor privity of contract, so that these parties cannot take advantage, the one against the other, of the covenants, either in law or in deed, which exist between the original lessor and lessee.—Watk. Conv. 308.

Under Treasurer of England [vice-thesaurarius Angliæ, Lat.], he who transacted the business of the Lord High Treasurer.

Under-writer, an insurer of ships, so called from his writing his name under the policy of insurance.

Undress, minors or persons under age not capable of bearing arms.—Fleta, l. 1, c. ix.

Undue influence, any force, violence, or restraint, or the infliction of, or threat to inflict, any injury, or the practice of any intimidation, in order to induce any person to vote, or refrain from voting, or on account of his having done so; every person so offending is guilty of a misdemeanor, and forfeits the sum of 50*l.*; and if any candidate for any county or borough shall be declared by any election committee guilty of this offence, he shall be incapable of sitting in parliament for such county or borough during the parliament then in existence.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, ss. 5, 36; amended and continued by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, and 26 Vict. c. 29.

As to the undue influence which will invalidate a will, Mr. Justice Williams says:—'The sort of influence which will invalidate a will is thus described by Eyre, C. B., in Mountain v. Bennett, 1 Cox, 355. There is another ground which, though not so distinct as that of actual force, nor so easy to be proved, yet if it should be made out, would certainly destroy the will, that is if a dominion was acquired by any person over a mind of sufficient sanity to general purposes, and of sufficient soundness and discretion to regulate his affairs in general, yet if such a dominion or influence were acquired over him as to prevent the exercise of such discretion, it would be equally inconsistent with the idea of a disposing mind.' But the influence to vitiate an Act must amount to force and coercion, destroying free agency. It must not be the influence of affection and attachment; it must not be the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another, for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act. Further, there must be proof that the act was obtained by this coercion; by importunity which could not be resisted; that it was done merely for the sake of peace; so that the motive was tantamount to force and fear.—1 Williams on Executors, p. 44.

Union-jack, the national flag of Great Britain and Ireland, which combines the banner of St. Patrick with the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew. The word jack is most probably derived from the surcoat, charged with a red cross, anciently used by the English soldiery. This appears to have been called a jacque, whence the word jacket, anciently written jacquit. Some, however, without a shadow of evidence, derive the word from Jacques, the first alteration having been made in the reign of King James I.

Unity, a coincidence of qualities.

Unity of possession, where one has a right to two estates, and holds them together in his own hands, as if a person take a lease of lands from another at a certain rent, and afterwards buys the fee-simple, this is an unity of possession by which the lease is extinguished, because that he who had before the occupation only for his rent, is now become lord and owner of the land.—Termes de la Ley. See JOINT-TENANCY.

Universal agent, one who is appointed to do all the acts which the principal can personally do, and which he may lawfully delegate the power to another to do. Such an universal agency may potentially exist, but it must be of the rarest occurrence. And indeed it is difficult to conceive of the existence of such an agency practically, inasmuch as it would be to make such an agent the complete master, not merely dux facti but dominus rerum, the complete disposer of all the rights and property of the principal. It is very certain that the law will not from any general expressions, however broad, infer the existence of any such universal agency; but it will rather construe them as restrained to the principal business of the party, in respect to which it is presumed his intention to delegate the authority was principally directed.—Story's Agency, 18.

Universal legacy, a testamentary disposition by which the testator gives to one or more persons the whole of the property which he leaves at his decease.—Civ. Law.

Usance [Fr.], the time which it is the usage of the countries, between which bills are drawn, to appoint for payment of them. According to the language of merchants, 'usance' signifies a month.

The length of the usance or time which it includes varies in different countries from fourteen days to one, two, or even three months after the date of the bill. Double or treble usance is double or treble the usual time, and half usance is half that time; when it is necessary to divide a month upon a half usance, the division, notwithstanding the difference in the length of the month, contains fifteen days. It has been said that the court could take judicial notice of foreign usances, which vary, being longer in one place than another, and therefore certainly the duration must be averred and proved.

Chitty on Bills, 255–257.

Uses. The austere and unbending rules of our common law were, at a very early period of our history, found to be altogether unfit for those intricate arrangements of realty which family settlements, commercial speculations, and the multiplied relationships amongst individuals in society required. The common law, in its pure but inflexible strictness, treated the actual possession of property, and the abstract right to it, as one and inseparable. In order to have ascertained the owner of a landed estate, the question was, 'Who was in possession of it?' The person who satisfied this inquiry was to all intents and for all purposes the owner of the property. Nor was it difficult to find him out, since the possession of his estate was conferred upon him by a formal and notorious ceremony, technically called livery of seisin, which was performed openly and in the presence of the people of the locality. Simple as this principle of law undoubtedly was, and convenient as the union of possession and proprietorship may appear, yet its simplicity was attended with hardship to the vassal, and resulted in the tyranny and oppression of the proud baron and the martial lord.

It soon became evident that the iron rules of the common law were unfit for an age in anywise advanced beyond barbarism, and guided by reason. An inflexible tenure and a difficult alienation were stumbling blocks to the increasing transfer of property, the career of commerce, the untrammelled dominion of one's own rights, and the complicated wants of an enterprising and refined people. As speculation expanded and the efforts of competitive industry multiplied, pressing emergencies and transitory difficulties sought accommodation and supply from landed property, and thence ingenuity was excited and experience sharpened to hit upon a device which should set at nought the sternness of existing law and the hardship of rigid ceremony.

A scheme was invented by the monastic jurists upon a model furnished to them by the civil law, which, by a nice adaptation, evaded, without overturning, the common law. Thus two methods of transferring realty began to coexist in this country—the ancient common law system, and the monkish invention, which is denominated Uses.

It is beyond the scope of the present inquiry to investigate the original cause of the introduction of Uses into this country, for whether they owe their origin to mystery, or were suggested under the influence of fraud and fear, they were furnished forth from the vast resources and recondite learning of the civil law, and rejoiced in the happy fortune of securing for their nurse and protector the ample influence of the Court of Chancery, which enabled them, notwithstanding the robust opposition with which they were received by the partisans and advocates of the old but impracticable institutions, to make a stand, to acquire strength, to become stable, then to be sanctioned, and eventually legalised by senatorial provision.

Thus a novel contrivance, which was at first but a trivial innovation, treated with contempt and indifference, has become, in its progress, a gigantic system, which having superseded the doctrines and practice of feudal law, is in fact the foundation of modern conveyancing.

Before the Statute of Uses, a use was in its nature equitable, and it may be defined to have been a right in Chancery to the beneficial ownership of an estate, the possession of which was vested, through confidence, in another. The person enjoying the beneficial right was called the cestui que use, or he to whose use the land was conveyed, and the person in possession the feoffee to uses. Thus A. conveyed an estate to F. to his (A.'s) own use or to the use of C.; F. was the feoffee to uses, and A. or C. as the case may be, the cestui que use.

The use consisted of three parts:—(1) That the feoffee to uses should suffer the cestui que use to take the profits; (2) that the feoffee to uses, upon the request of the cestui que use, or notice of his will, would convey the estate to the cestui que use or his heirs, or any other person by his direction; and, (3) that if the feoffee to uses had been deprived, and so the cestui que use disturbed, the feoffee to uses would re-enter or bring an action to recontinue his possession.

The following were the requisites to be observed in raising uses:—

(1) There should have been a person capable of standing seised to a use.

(2) There should have been a person capable of receiving or taking the use.

(3) There should have been either a consideration to raise, or a declaration of, the use.

(4) There should have been a sufficient substance or hereditament out of which the use might have arisen.

The properties of uses were these:—

(1) They were descendible according to the rules of the common law relating to the inheritable estates of intestates; and the special customs of gavelkind, borough-english, and copyholds, determined the particular descent of uses. This is an illustration of the well-known maxim, Æquitas sequitur legem.

(2) They were devisable even before the Statute of Wills, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 1.

(3) They were transferable, although at law they were mere choses in action.

(4) A cestui que use in possession of the land was deemed a tenant at will only, for he had neither jus in re, i. e. an estate, nor jus ad rem, i. e. a demand, and therefore he could bring no action, having neither title nor legal estate in the property.

(5) Neither could a widow be endowed, nor could a husband have his curtesy of a use, because the cestui que use had no legal seisin of the land.

(6) The cestui que use might have been impanelled on a jury.—2 Hen V. c. 3.

(7) The feoffee to uses, being complete owner of the land at law, performed the feudal duties, had power to sell, brought actions, his widow became entitled to dower, and his estate was subjected to wardship, relief, and forfeiture for treason or felony. In fact, he was treated at common law as the absolute tenant of the fee.

(8) A use, being but a creature of equity, could not have been taken in execution for the debts of the cestui que use; for there was no process at common law but against legal estates.

(9) A use, not being an object of tenure, was therefore exempt from the oppressive burdens of the feudal system. It was not forfeitable for treason or felony, because it was not held of any person. This was afterwards broken in upon by statute 12 Ric. II. c. 3.

(10) A use was neither a chattel nor an hereditament; it was not then assets either for the executor or the heir-at-law.

There were two kinds of uses, viz.—

(1) Official or active;
(2) Permissive or passive.

Uses were also distributable into

(1) Express;
(2) Constructive; and
(3) Resulting.

There appears to have been a distinction between a use and a trust, even before the Statute of Uses. The use was an equitable interest general and permanent in the land, but an equitable interest which was either special or transitory was strictly a trust. Let us give an illustration of the difference; suppose a feoffment in fee, which transferred the possession to the feoffee, in whom a confidence was placed to pay to some other person and his heirs the rents and profits, and to make such transfers as he or they should direct, this confidence was clearly the use, commensurate with the legal estate; the feoffee's permanent fee being subject to the distribution of the profits, and the direction of the cestui que use and his heirs. A trust, however, did not divide the property into possession and use, for in such a case they were both transferred to the feoffee, in whom a confidence was placed that he would retain both for some given purpose; ex. gra. a feoffment made by A. to B. in trust or to the intent to re-enfeoff A., or that B. should convey to a third person: the trusts or intents were not uses, for the feoffee was not to pay over the profits merely, but to dispose of the profits and also the possession. This was not deemed a use, but a special trust lawful, in contradistinction to the special trust unlawful, which was created for fraudulent purposes, as to defraud creditors, to defeat the Statute of Mortmain, and the like.

If the two following statutes be compared, it will be manifest that Parliament did not consider the use and special trust to be the same: the 50 Edw. III. c. 6, subjected the special trust to an execution by a creditor of the cestui que trust; while the 19 Hen. VII c. 15, extended, for the first time, the estate of the cestui que use.

It is, therefore, important clearly to distinguish these three interests:—(1) The use, properly so called (which we have tried to explain); (2) the special trust lawful; and (3) the special trust unlawful. See TRUSTS.

'Though these uses,' remarks Lord C. B. Gilbert (Uses, c. i., s. 8), 'had a very equitable beginning, yet like all new models and general schemes of ordering property, it introduced a great many unforeseen inconveniences, and subverted in many instances the institution and policy of the common law.

'First. Estates passed by way of use, from one to another, by bare words only, without any solemn ceremony or permanent record of the transaction, whereby a third person that had right knew not against whom to bring his action.

'Secondly. Uses passing by will, the heirs were disinherited by the inadvertent words of dying persons.

'Thirdly. Lords lost their wardships, reliefs, marriages, and escheats: the trustees letting cestui que use continue the possession, whereby the real tenants that held the lands could not be discovered.

'Fourthly. The king lost the estates of aliens and criminals; for they made their friends trustees, who kept possession, and secretly gave them the profits so as the use was undiscovered.

'Fifthly. Purchasers were insecure; for the alienation of cestui que use in the possession was at common law a disseisin, and 1 Ric. III. c. 1, gave him power to alien what he had; yet the feoffees may still enter to revest a remainder or contingent use, which were never published by any record or livery, whereby the purchaser could know of them.

'Sixthly. The use was not subject to the payment of debts.

'Seventhly. Many lost their rights by perjury in averment of secret uses.

'Eighthly. Uses might be allowed in mortmain.'

These grievances led the way to the Statute of Uses.

The Act 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10, which transferred the equitable use into the legal estate by executing it in possession, is known by several names. It is usually called The Statute of Uses; its title on the Parliament Roll is, 'An Act concerning Uses and Wills,' and in pleading, it is described as Statutum de usibus in possessionem transferendis. It is the Magna Charta of English conveyancing.

It has been generally said that the object aimed at by the passing of this statute, which entirely revolutionised the system of the transfer of real property, was the total destruction of the use, by effecting an amalgamation of the legal and equitable interests; but, however this might be, it is certain that such an object has been signally defeated by the creation of the modern trust, which sprang from the judicial interpretation by the common law judges of the meaning of this celebrated statute.

There are six circumstances necessary to the execution of uses under the statute, viz.:—

(1) A person seised to the use.

(2) A cestui que use in esse.

(3) A use in esse in possession, reversion, or remainder.

(4) Every species of realty, except copyholds, whether corporeal or incorporeal, in possession, reversion, or remainder, may be conveyed to uses, but it must be in esse.

(5) There must be a seisin in the grantee, or feoffee, to uses at the time of the execution of the use.

(6) The use may be raised by a conveyance, operating either by transmutation or non-transmutation of possession.

A classification of uses may be thus arranged:

I. Present or executed, distributable into:

(a) Those arising by act of parties, which are created either

(1) By express declaration in a deed,

(2) By presumed intention in a will,

(3) By certain considerations.

(b) Those arising by act of law, which are either

(1) Resulting,

(2) Implied.

II. Future or executory (so called because they are not executed into legal estates, by the statute, till they arise), distributable into:—

(a) Shifting or secondary,

(b) Springing,

(c) Contingent.

The following interests have been adjudged to be unaffected by the Statute of Uses:—

(1) Uses limited of copyholds: since no person can be introduced into the estate without the lord's consent; for if uses were permitted, there would then be effected a transmutation of the possession by operation of law, which would be contrary to the peculiarity of this kind of tenure.

Yet shifting or springing uses may be limited by copyhold surrenders, so as to have the effect of divesting prior vested estates.

(2) Leaseholds for years and chattel interests. It is said that the statute contemplated freeholds only, and therefore employed the word SEISED; now a tenant is possessed only of a leasehold for years.

(3) Active and constructive uses. When the use involves a direction to sell the estate and then divide the proceeds of the sale or to pay debts, or to pay over the profits, or to convey to a child on attaining majority, or to reconvey on the repayment of a mortgage-loan, the statute was precluded from the very nature of the transaction from converting such a use into a legal right to the land, and equity, therefore, compels the trustee, who retains the legal estate notwithstanding the statute, to perform the duty confided in him.

And the trustee has the legal estate in the following cases:—A trust to permit a feme covert to receive the profits for, or to pay the same to, her separate use; and so of a trust to permit and suffer a party to receive and take the net rents and profits.

(4) A second use, or a use upon a use. The common law judges determined that the statute could only operate upon one use, and where another use was superadded, it was a mere nullity, so that in a grant to A. to the use of B., to the use of C., the statute transferred A.'s possession to B., and turned B.'s use into the legal estate, and having done this, it went no farther, but stopped short and could not meddle with C.'s use, which was an interest unknown before the statute. Upon this, equity interfered, and resuming her old dominion, treated C., the person having the second use, as the beneficiary, and compelled B., having the statute-use, to deal with the estate for C.'s benefit as a trustee, and then giving the technical term of 'trust' to C.'s second use, deprived the use properly so called of its beneficial interest, which was its very essence before the statute, and revived the twofold system of one person holding the legal estate in the land, while the equitable estate or the usufructuary right therein was actually enjoyed by another. So that the old scheme of things was recurred to, whilst the terms were somewhat changed, for uses executed by the statute still retained their name, the cestui que use being called the legal owner; but, uses not so executed, i. e. secondary uses, or a use upon a use, took the appellation of trusts, while the holder of such uses is commonly denominated the cestui que trust or beneficiary; and thus the Court of Chancery regained its jurisdiction over uses under the name of trusts.

Although for distinction's sake, and in practice, the first use, executed by the statute, is called a use, and the second use, not executed by the statute, a trust, yet this phraseology is altogether arbitrary, for either word may be applied indiscriminately and convertibly to either estate, since the particular interests enjoyed by the parties depend upon their position with regard to one another, and not upon the term employed in their denomination. The usual and strictly technical form is:—

To F. to the use of C. in trust for E.; but it is immaterial whether it is in this form; or,

To F. to the use of C. to the use of E.; or,

To F. in trust for C. to the use of E.; or,

To F. in trust for C. in trust for E.;

the effect in any of the above formulæ being precisely the same, for C. would be the legal owner and E. the beneficial; so that a trust in name may be a use in effect, and è converso.

(5) Contingent uses, during the suspense of the contingency, cannot be executed by the statute, because the requisites to execute the use cannot concur.

(6) It is said, that devises are not within the Statute of Uses, because it was passed before the Statute of Wills (32 Hen. VIII. c. 1, A.D. 1540). But this is of no practical importance, since the courts, in their decisions, are entirely guided by a testator's intention, and it has been always held, that if A. devise to B. and his heirs, to the use of or in trust for C. and his heirs, or in trust to permit C. and his heirs to take the profits, it shows that the testator intended that C. should have the legal estate in fee, and so the law decides. And if there be a devise to the use of A. for life, with remainder over, although it cannot take effect by way of a use executed by the statute, because there is no seisin to serve the use, yet A. will have the legal estate. Indeed uses will be executed in a will, as if they were limited by deed, if such be the testator's intent.

Conveyances to uses legalise many dispositions, which are altogether void at the common law, for uses may be suspended, revived, postponed and accelerated in a way altogether opposed to the rules of the ancient feudal law. Amongst the most important relaxations thus introduced are the following:—

(1) A person can convey to himself, which he could not at the common law, as it would have been absurd to give possession by livery of seisin to one's self. This is found to be convenient, especially in the following example:—

It frequently happens, that upon the death or removal of trustees, it becomes necessary to fill up their number pursuant to a power for that purpose, usually introduced into settlements of real property. In order to effect this, it is now the practice for the old trustees to make a conveyance, which operates by way of transmutation of possession (either by release or grant), to the new trustees and their heirs, to the use of the old and new trustees and their heirs. Without the assistance, therefore, of the Statute of Uses, it would have been necessary in the above case that the old trustees should have first enfeoffed A., who would have re-enfeoffed the old and new trustees jointly: thereby making two conveyances necessary. Indeed, in the case of terms of years, and other personal property, two assignments were required for this purpose, until 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 21.

(2) A conveyance could not have been made by a husband to his wife, but now by limiting a seisin to the grantee or releasee, the husband may declare the use to his wife, which the statute will execute.

(3) A man could not make his own heir a purchaser, even of an estate-tail, for filius est pars patris—hæres est pars antecessoris; but now a man may limit the use so as to make his heirs special take, either by purchase or descent.

(4) No person could take a present interest in the habendum of a deed who was not named in the premises. But in a case where A. enfeoffed B., habendum to the said B. and C., their heirs and assigns, to the use and behoof of the said B. and C. their heirs and assigns; it was resolved, that as C. was not named in the premises, he could take no possession originally by the habendum; and that the livery, made according to the intent of the indenture, did not give anything to C. because as to him it was void; but though the feoffment did not give any seisin to C. yet it did to B. and his heir, which seisin was sufficient to serve the use declared to C. Therefore the use limited to B. and C. was good, and the statute executed it. But this limitation of the use in a bargain and sale to a person not named in the premises, after a previous disposition of it to the bargainee, would be void, for the reasons before mentioned.

(5) So it is a rule of law, that if an estate be conveyed to two, the one being capable and the other incapable at the time of the grant, he who is capable shall take the whole; and that joint tenants cannot take at different periods. But since the introduction of uses, if A. make a feoffment in fee, to the use of B. and his wife that shall be: though the whole estate will vest in B. at first, yet upon his marriage the wife shall take jointly with him. So if a disseisin be had to the use of two, and the one agrees to it at one time, and the other at another, they shall be joint tenants.

(6) An estate of freehold cannot be granted at the common law, to commence in futuro, nor can a contingent remainder be supported, without an express particular estate of freehold; but by a conveyance under the Statute of Uses, a freehold can be created to commence in futuro, and future limitations will be supported, when no particular estate has been made, either as remainders or springing uses.

(7) An estate cannot at the common law be limited upon a fee-simple, i. e. a fee-simple cannot be made to cease as to one, and take effect by way of limitation upon a contingent event, in favor of another person; but such a limitation may take effect by way of shifting or springing use. A shifting or springing use, after a previous limitation of the fee, cannot be barred by the cestui que use by any kind of conveyance, but where it is limited upon an estate-tail the tenant-in-tail may bar it.

(8) Every remainder, at the common law, must be limited, so as to await the determination of the particular estate, before it can take effect in possession; but an abridgment of the particular estate, upon a certain condition, can be effected by a conveyance to uses, so as to accelerate the expectant estate into possession.

There are three conveyances, viz. Appointment to uses, Bargain and Sale, and Covenant to stand seised, which do not transmute the possession; and three, viz. Feoffment, Grant, and Release, which do transmute the possession. The following examples point out the peculiar operation of these two classes of transfers, as to the vesting of the legal and equitable estates:—

An Appointment, Bargain and Sale, or Covenant to stand seised	to D. and his heirs	To the use of T. and his heirs	To the use of, or in trust for, S. and his heirs vests the legal estate or use in D. and the equitable estate in S., T. not taking anything. But

A Feoffment, Grant, or Release	to D. and his heirs	To the use of T. and his heirs	To the use of, or in trust for, S. and his heirs gives D. but a seisin, and vests the use or legal estate in T., and the equitable estate in S.

Use and Occupation. By 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 14, it is enacted, that it shall be lawful for the landlord, where the agreement is not by deed, to recover a reasonable satisfaction for the lands, tenements, or hereditaments held or occupied by the defendant in an action on the case, for the use or occupation of what was so held or enjoyed; and if in evidence on the trial of such action, any parol demise, or any agreement (not being by deed) whereon a certain rent was reserved, shall appear, the plaintiff in such action shall not therefore be nonsuited, but may make use thereof as an evidence of the quantum of the damages to be recovered.—Woodf. Land. and Ten. 663, et seq.; 2 Selw. N. P. 1380.

User de action, the pursuing or bringing an action in the proper county, &c.

Usher [fr. huis, Fr., a door], a door-keeper, an officer who keeps a court quiet. The office of usher of the Court of Chancery is abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Usque ad filum aquæ [Lat.] (even to the middle of the stream).

Usual terms, a phrase in the common law practice, which means pleading issuably, rejoining gratis, and taking short notice of trial.

Usucapio, the enjoying, by continuance of time, a long possession or prescription; property acquired by use or possession.—Civ. Law.

Usufruct, the right of using (usus) and reaping the fruits (fructus) of things belonging to others, without destroying or wasting the subject over which such right extends.—Ibid.

Usufructuary, he who has the use and reaps the profit of a thing.

Usura dicitur quia datur pro usu æris.—2 Inst. 89.—(Usury is so called, because it is given for the use of money.)

Usura est commodum certum quod propter usum rei (vel æris) mutuatæ recipitur; sed, secundariò sperare de aliquâ retributione, ad voluntatem ejus qui mutuatus est, hoc non est vitiosum.—5 Co. 70.—(Usury is a certain benefit which is received for the use of a thing (or of money) lent; but, secondly, to hope for a certain return, at the option of the party who borrowed, this is not vicious.)

Usura maritima [fœnus nauticum, Lat.], interest taken on bottomry or respondentia bonds, which is proportioned to the risk, and was not affected by the abolished usury-laws. 19 Geo. II. c. 37.

Usurpation, a keeping or holding by using that which is another's; an interruption of usucapio, or disturbing a man in his right and possession, &c. It is called intrusion in the civil and canon laws.—Sand. Just. 236.

Usury, any reward taken for the use of money. The term is usually applied to the taking of exorbitant interest, or of interest to a greater amount than is allowed by law. Many statutes have at different times been passed fixing the legal rates of interest; the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90, repeals all existing laws against usury. But nothing therein contained shall prejudice or affect the rights or remedies of any person, or diminish or alter the liabilities of any person, in respect of any act done previously to the passing of this Act (10th Aug. 1854) (s. 2).

Where interest is now payable upon any contract, express or implied, the payment of the legal or current rate of interest (5*l.* per cent. per annum), or where upon any debt or sum of money interest is now payable by any rule of law, the same rate of interest shall be recoverable as if this Act had not been passed (s. 3).

Nothing therein contained shall extend or be constructed to extend to repeal or affect any statute relating to pawnbrokers, but that all laws touching and concerning pawnbrokers shall remain in full force and effect, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as if this Act had not been passed (s. 4). By 13 Geo. III. c. 63, s. 30, the highest rate of legal interest to be taken on any contract by any British subject in the East Indies is 12*l.* per cent.

Usus est dominium fiduciarium.—Bacon's Read. Stat. Uses.—(Use is a fiduciary dominion.)

Usus et status sive possessio potius differunt secundum rationem fori, quam secundum rationem rei.—Ibid.—(Use and estate, or possession, differ more in the rule of the court than in the rule of the matter.)

Utas [octava, Lat.], the eighth day following any term or feast.

Uterine brother [uterinus frater, Lat.], a brother born of the same mother, but by a different father.

Utero-gestation, pregnancy.

Utfangethef. See OUTFANGTHEF.

Utile per inutile non vitiatur.—Dyer, 292.—(The useful is not vitiated by the useless.)

Uti possidetis [Lat.] (as you possess).

Utlagatus est quasi extra legem positus: caput gerit lupinum.—7 Co. 14.—(An outlaw is, as it were, put out of the protection of the law: he carries the head of a wolf.)

Utlagatus pro contumaciâ et fugâ, non propter hoc convictus est de facto principali.—Fleta.—(One who is outlawed for contumacy and flight, is not on that account convicted of the principal fact.)

Utlaghe [fr. utlagatus, Lat.], an outlaw.

Utlawry, outlawry, which see.

Utlesse, an escape of a felon out of prison.

Ut pœna ad paucos, metus ad omnes perveniat.—4 Inst. 6.—(So that punishment may fall on few, the fear of it on all.)

Ut summæ potestatis regis est posse quantum velit, sic magnitudinis est velle quantum possit. 3 Inst. 236.—(As the highest power of a king is to be able to do what he wishes, so the highest greatness of him is to wish what he is able to do.)

Utter barristers [juris consulti, Lat.], barristers who plead without the bar; ouster barristers.

Uttering, tendering, selling; putting in circulation; publishing.

Uxor furi desponsata non tenebitur ex facto viri, quia virum accusare non debet, nec detegere furtum suum, nec feloniam, cum ipsa sui potestatem non habet, sed vir.—3 Inst. 108.—(A woman married to a thief shall not be bound by his actions, for she cannot accuse her husband, nor discover the robbery nor felony, since she has no power over herself, but her husband has power over her.)

Uxor non est sui juris, sed sub potestate viri, cui in vitâ contradicere non potest.—(A wife has no power of her own, but is under the government of her husband, whom in his lifetime she cannot contradict.)

V.

Vacant possession. See EJECTMENT.

Vacant succession, an inheritance the heir to which is unknown.

Vacantia bona, things without an owner.—Civ. Law.

Vacation, intermission of juridical proceeding or any other stated employments; recess of courts or senates.—Encyc. Lond. See LONG VACATION and HOLIDAY.

Vacatura, an avoidance of an ecclesiastical benefice.

Vaccaria, a dairy.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Vaccination (compulsory) Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 100, amended by 21 Vict c. 25, s. 7; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 59; and see 3 & 4 Vict. c. 29, amended by 4 & 5 Vict. c. 32. As to Ireland, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 52; as to Scotland 26 & 27 Vict. c. 108.

Vackeel, Vakeel, Vaqueel, one endowed with authority to act for another; ambassador; agent sent on a special commission, or residing at a court; also a native law pleader or attorney. Indian.

Vadiare duellum (to wage combat), where two contending parties, on a challenge, do give and take a mutual pledge of fighting.—Cowel.

Vadium [fr. vas, vadis, Lat.], a pledge or surety.—Civ. Law.

Vadium mortuum, a mortgage or dead-pledge.

Vadium ponere, to take bail or pledges for a defendant's appearance.

Vadium vivum, a vifgage or living pledge. See VIVUM VADIUM.

Vadlet, the king's eldest son—hence the valet or knave follows the king and queen in a pack of cards.—Barr. on Stat. 344.

Vagabond, a wanderer; an idle fellow. See 23 Edw. III. c. 7; 12 Ric. II. c. 7; 11 Hen. VII. c. 2; 19 Hen. VII. c. 12; 22 Hen. VIII. c. 12; 27 Hen. VIII. c. 25; 1 Edw. I. cc. 7, 25; 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 23; and 5 Reeves, c. xxxiii., p. 14.

Vagrants, sturdy beggars; vagabonds.

The Act which is now in force, embodying and extending numerous former provisions, is 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, amended by 1 & 2 Vict c. 38. It points out three classes of persons:—

1st, Idle and disorderly persons; 2nd, rogues and vagabonds; 3rd, incorrigible rogues.

First. Idle and Disorderly Persons.—The following are, under 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 3, to be deemed 'idle and disorderly persons,' within its true intent and meaning, so that any justice of the peace may commit them (being convicted before him on his own view, or by the confession of the offender, or by the evidence of one or more credible witness or witnesses) to the house of correction, there to be kept to hard labor for any time not exceeding one calendar month, subject to an appeal to the sessions, viz.:—

(1) Every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or herself, or his or her family, by work or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, by which refusal or neglect he or she, or any of his or her family whom he or she may be legally bound to maintain, shall have become chargeable to any parish, township, or place.

(2) Every person returning to and becoming chargeable in any parish, township, or place, whence he or she shall have been legally removed, by order of two justices of the peace, unless he or she shall produce a certificate of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of some other parish, township, or place, thereby acknowledging him or her to be settled in such other parish, township, or place.

(3) Every petty chapman or pedlar wandering abroad, and trading without being duly licensed or otherwise authorised by law.

(4) Every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways, or in any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous and indecent manner.

(5) Every person wandering abroad, or placing himself or herself in any public place, street, highway, court, or passage, to beg or gather alms, or causing or procuring, or encouraging any children so to do.

(6) And by 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 16, every person asking alms under a certificate, or other instrument prohibited by the Act.

The only certificates of magistrates still legal are:—

Certificates granted by visiting justices, enabling persons discharged from gaols, &c., to receive alms or relief on their route to their place of settlement, under 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 15.

Certificates granted by a justice to a soldier, sailor, or marine, duly discharged, stating the place to which he wishes to go, being his home or legal settlement; or granted to the wife of a non-commissioned officer or soldier ordered on foreign service, and not permitted to embark with him, under 43 Geo. III. c. 61, ss. 1, 2, saved by 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, ss. 15, 16.

Admiralty or War-office certificates, or passes, granted as heretofore to discharged sailors, soldiers, or marines, or to the families of such persons serving abroad, or lately deceased, under 43 Geo. III. c. 61, s. 4, saved by 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 15, have the same effect as the former.

In these three cases, the asking or having relief is legal; but loitering, &c., by a party discharged from prison makes him a rogue and vagabond.—5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 15.

(7) Every person relieved in a workhouse, and refusing or neglecting while therein to perform the task of four hours' work prescribed by the guardians of the parish or union, being suited to his age, strength, and capacity, or wilfully destroying or injuring his own clothes, or damaging any property of the guardians.

(8) Every woman neglecting to maintain her bastard child, being able wholly or in part so to do, whereby it becomes chargeable to any parish or union.

(9) Every poor person returning and becoming chargeable in the asylum of any district, after removal from any parish in such district, shall be deemed to have returned and become chargeable, without certificate to the parish whence he has been legally removed.

Secondly. Rogues and Vagabonds.—The following are, by 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 4, to be deemed as 'rogues and vagabonds,' whom it is lawful for any justice of the peace to commit (being convicted before him by the confession of the offender, or by the evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses), to the house of correction, and there to be kept to hard labor for any time not exceeding three calendar months, subject as in the case of idle and disorderly persons, to an appeal to the sessions, viz.:

(1) Every person committing any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned, after having been convicted as an idle and disorderly person.

(2) Every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry, or otherwise to deceive and impose on any of Her Majesty's subjects.

(3) Every person wandering abroad, or lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied buildings, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in any cart or waggon, not having any visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of himself or herself.

(4) Every person unlawfully exposing to view in any street, road, highway, or public place, any obscene print, picture, or other indecent exhibition; or wilfully exposing, or causing to be exposed to public view, in the window or other part of any shop or other building situate in any street, road, highway or public place, any obscene print, picture, or other indecent exhibition.

(5) Every person wilfully, openly, lewdly, and obscenely exposing his person in any street, road, or public highway, or in the view thereof, or in any place of public resort, with intent to insult any female.

(6) Every person wandering abroad, and endeavouring by the exposure of wounds or deformities to obtain or gather alms.

(7) Every person going about as gatherer or collector of alms, or endeavouring to procure charitable contributions of any nature or kind, under any false or fraudulent pretence.

(8) Every person running away and leaving his wife, or his or her child or children, chargeable, or whereby she or they or any of them shall become chargeable to any parish, township, or place.

(9) Every person playing or betting in any street, road, highway, or other open or public place, at or with any table or instrument of gaming, at any game or pretended game of chance.

(10) Every person having in his or her custody or possession, any pick-lock, key, crow, jack-bit, or other implement, with intent feloniously to break into any dwelling-house, warehouse, coach-house, stable, or outbuilding, or being armed with any gun, pistol, hanger, cutlass, bludgeon, or other offensive weapon, or having upon him or her any instrument with intent to commit any felonious act.

(11) Every person being found in or upon any dwelling-house, warehouse, coach-house, stable, or outhouse, or in any inclosed yard, garden, or area, for any unlawful purpose.

(12) Every suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock, or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse, near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or any avenue leading thereto, or any street, highway, or place adjacent, with intent to commit felony.

(13) Every person apprehended as an idle and disorderly person, and violently resisting any constable or other peace officer, so apprehending him or her, and being subsequently convicted of the offence for which he or she shall have been so apprehended.

(14) And by 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 15, persons discharged from prisons, to whom certificates or instruments have been delivered by the visiting justices, enabling them to have or receive alms or relief on the route to their places of settlement, but acting contrary to the directions of the certificate, or loitering on, or deviating from their route.

Thirdly. Incorrigible Rogues.—The following persons are by 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 5, to be deemed 'incorrigible rogues' under the Act:—

(1) Every person breaking or escaping out of any place of legal confinement, before the expiration of the term for which he or she shall have been committed or ordered to be confined by virtue of this Act.

(2) Every person committing any offence against this Act, which shall subject him or her to be dealt with as a rogue and vagabond, such person having been at some former time adjudged so to be and duly convicted thereof.

(3) And every person apprehended as a rogue and vagabond, and violently resisting any constable or other peace officer so apprehending him or her, and being subsequently convicted of the offence for which he or she shall have been so apprehended.

As to these it is enacted, 'that it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him by the confession of such offender, or by the evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses), to the house of correction, there to remain until the next general or quarter-sessions of the peace; and every such offender, who shall be so committed to the house of correction, shall be there kept to hard labor during the period of his or her imprisonment.' And further, it is enacted, 'that when any incorrigible rogue shall have been committed to the house of correction, there to remain until the next general or quarter-sessions, it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace there assembled to examine into the circumstances of the case, and to order, if they think fit, that such offender be imprisoned in the house of correction, and be there kept to hard labor for any time not exceeding one year from the time of making such order; and to order further, if they think fit, that such offender (not being a female) be punished by whipping, at such time during his imprisonment, and at such place within their jurisdiction, as, according to the nature of the offence, they in their discretion shall deem expedient.'

Valec, Valect, or Vadelet, a young gentleman; also a servitor or gentleman of the chamber.

Valentia, the value or price of anything.

Valesheria, the proving by the kindred of the slain, one on the father's side, and another on that of the mother, that a man was a Welshman.

Valor beneficiorum, the value of every ecclesiastical benefice and preferment, according to which the first fruits and tenths are collected and paid. It is commonly called the King's books, by which the clergy are at present rated.

Valor maritagii (the value of marriage). See TENURE.

Valuable consideration. See CONSIDERATION.

Value, a relative term. The value of a thing means the quantity of some other thing, or of things in general, which it exchanges for. The values of all things can never, therefore, rise or fall simultaneously. There is no such thing as a general rise or a general fall of values. Every rise of value supposes a fall, and every fall a rise.

The temporary or market value of a thing depends on the demand and supply; rising as the demand rises, and falling as the supply rises. The demand, however, varies with the value, being generally greater when the thing is cheap than when it is dear; and the value always adjusts itself in such a manner that the demand is equal to the supply.

Besides their temporary value, things have also a permanent, or as it may be called a natural value, to which the market value, after every variation, always tends to return; and the oscillations compensate for one another, so that on the average, commodities exchange at about their natural value.

The natural value of some things is a scarcity value, but most things naturally exchange for one another, in the ratio of their cost of production, or at what may be termed their cost value.

The word 'value,' when used without adjunct, always means, in political economy, value in exchange; or as it has been called by Adam Smith and his successors, exchangeable value, a phrase which no amount of authority that can be quoted for it can make other than bad English. Mr. De Quincey substitutes the term exchange-value, which is unexceptionable. 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 528, 578.

The word 'value,' it is to be observed, has two different meanings, and sometimes expresses the utility of some particular object, and sometimes the power of purchasing other goods which the possession of that object conveys. The one may be called 'value in use;' the other 'value in exchange.' The things which have the greatest value in use have frequently little or no value in exchange; and, on the contrary, those which have the greatest value in exchange have frequently little or no value in use. Nothing is more useful than water; but it will purchase scarce anything; scarce anything can be had in exchange for it. A diamond, on the contrary, has scarce any value in use; but a very great quantity of other goods may frequently be had in exchange for it.—1 Smi. Wealth of Nat. 37.

Value received, a phrase generally inserted in bills of exchange, but which is not necessary, since value is implied in every bill, as much as if expressed in totidem verbis.—White v. Ledwick, 4 Doug. 247; Chit. on Bills, 110.

Valuer, a person whose business is to appraise, or set a value upon property.

Valvasors, or Vidames, an obsolete title of dignity next to a peer.—2 Inst. 667.

Vana est illa potentia quæ nunquam venit in actum.—2 Co. 51.—(Vain is that power which never comes into play.)

Vancouver's Island. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 48; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 99, s. 6.

Van Diemen's Land. See TASMANIA.

Vani timores sunt æstimandi, qui non cadunt in constantem virum.—7 Co. 27.—(Those fears are to be counted vain which affect not a resolute man.)

Vantarius, a precursor.

Variance, difference; variation.

The courts are now very liberal in permitting variances in proceedings to be amended, especially where parties will suffer no prejudice.

Vassal [fr. vassallo, Ital., a dim. of vassus, low Lat. Wachter refers it to the Gallic gwas, a servant], one who holds of a superior lord; a subject; a dependent; a tenant or feudatory.

Vassalage, the state of a vassal; tenure at will; slavery.

Vasseleria, the tenure or holding of a vassal.

Vasto, a writ against tenants for term of life or years; committing waste.—F. N. B. 55.

Vastum, a waste or common lying open to the cattle of all tenants who have a right of commoning.

Vastum forestæ vel bosci, that part of a forest or wood wherein the trees and underwood were so destroyed, that it lay in a manner waste and barren.—Paroch. Antiq. 351.

Vauderie, sorcery; witchcraft; the profession of the Vaudois.—3 Hall. M. A. c. ix., pt. 2, p. 386 n.

Vavasor [a diminutive of vassal], a vassal of a vassal; a mesne tenant, one who held a fee of a vassal.—Encyc. Lond.; 1 Hall. M. A. c. ii., pt. 2, p. 194.

Vavasory, the lands that a vavasor held.

Vavasour, one who, himself holding of a superior lord, has others holding under him; a person magnæ dignitatis, so called tanquam Vas sortitum ad valetudinem.—Camden; 1 Reeves, c. v., p. 268.

Veal-money. The tenants of the manor of Bradford, in the county of Wilts, pay a yearly rent by this name to their lord, in lieu of veal paid formerly in kind.—Bract.

Vectigal judiciarium, fines paid to the Crown to defray the expenses of maintaining courts of justice.—3 Salk. 33.

Vectigal, origine ipsâ, jus Cæsarum et regum patrimoniale est.—Dav. 12.—(Tribute, in its origin, is the patrimonial right of emperors and kings.)

Vejours [visores, Lat.], persons sent by a court to take a view of any place in question, for the better decision of the right thereto; also, persons appointed to view the result of an offence.—O. N. B. 112.

Veltraria, the office of dog-leader or courser.

Veltrarius [fr. welter, Germ.], one who leads greyhounds.—Blount.

Venaria, beasts caught in the woods by hunting.

Venatio, hunting.

Vendee, one to whom anything is sold.

Vendens eandem rem duobus falsarius est. Jenk. Cent. 107.—(He is a fraudulent man who sells the same thing to two persons.)

Vender, or Vendor, a seller.

Any seller or mortgagor of land, or of any chattels, real or personal, or choses in action conveyed or assigned to a purchaser, or the solicitor or agent of any such seller or mortgagor, who shall after the passing of this Act (13th August, 1859) conceal any settlement, deed, will, or other instrument material to the title, or any incumbrance from the purchaser, or falsify any pedigree upon which the title does or may depend, in order to induce him to accept the title offered or produced to him, with intent in any of such cases to defraud, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being found guilty shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to suffer such punishment, by fine or imprisonment for any time not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, or by both, as the court shall award, and shall also be liable to an action for damages at the suit of the purchaser or mortgagee, or those claiming under the purchaser or mortgagee, for any loss sustained by them or either or any of them in consequence of the settlement, deed, will, or other instruments or incumbrance so concealed, or of any claim made by any person under such pedigree, but whose right was concealed by the falsification of such pedigree, and in estimating such damages, where the estate shall be recovered from such purchaser, or mortgagee, or from those claiming under the purchaser or mortgagee, regard shall be had to any expenditure by them or either or any of them in improvements on the land; but no prosecution for any offence included in this section against any sellor or mortgagor, or any solicitor or agent, shall be commenced without the sanction of Her Majesty's Attorney-General, or in case that office be vacant of Her Majesty's Solicitor-General; and no such sanction shall be given without such previous notice of the application for leave to prosecute to the person intended to be prosecuted as the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General (as the case may be) shall direct.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 24. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 8, it is enacted that the above section shall be read and construed as if the word 'or mortgagee' had followed the word 'purchaser' in every place where the latter word is introduced in the said section. As to the law of vendor and purchaser, see Lord St. Leonards' Vendors and Purchasers.

Vendible, saleable, marketable.

Vendition, sale, the act of selling.

Venditioni exponas, a judicial writ addressed to the sheriff, commanding him to expose to sale goods which he has already taken into his hands, to satisfy a judgment-creditor. Reg. Judic. 33. After delivery of this writ, the sheriff is bound to sell the goods, and have the money in court on the return-day of the writ. 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 666.

Vendue, a public sale or auction.

Vendue-master, an auctioneer.

Venella, a narrow or straight way.

Venia, a kneeling or low prostration on the ground by penitents.

Veniæ facilitas incentivum est delinquendi.—3 Inst. 236.—(Facility of pardon is an incentive to crime.)

Venia ætatis, a privilege granted by a prince or sovereign, in virtue of which a person is entitled to act, sui juris, as if he were of full age.—Story's Confl. of Laws, 74.

Venire facias, a judicial writ awarded to the sheriff to summon a jury for the trial of a cause, but abolished by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 104. It is the first process in outlawry, when a person charged with a misdemeanor absconds. 4 Step. Com. 467, 473.

Venire facias tot matronas, a writ to summon a jury of matrons to execute the writ de ventre inspiciendo.

Venire facias de novo, a second writ to summon another jury for a new trial.

The venire de novo was the old common law mode of proceeding to a second trial, and differed materially from granting a new trial, inasmuch as it was awarded from some defect appearing upon the face of the record, while a new trial was granted for matter entirely extrinsic. Where a verdict could have been amended, a venire de novo was never awarded. If awarded, the party succeeding at the second trial was not entitled to the costs of the first. It is now superseded by a trial de novo.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1536.

Venison, deer.

Venter, womb.

Ventre inspiciendo. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO.

Venue [fr. vicinetum, visnetum, Lat.], a neighboring place; the place whence a jury are to come for trial of causes.

Local actions must be brought in the county in which the cause of action arose; but transitory actions in any county at the plaintiff's option.

No venue shall be changed without a special order of the court or a judge, unless by consent of the parties.—H. T. 1853, r. 18.

The committee of judges to whom the question was referred, as to the practice to be adopted in consequence of the above rule, have reported:

First. 'That in their opinion it is more convenient, as a general rule, that the application to change the venue by rule or summons may be made before issue joined, provided that this shall not prejudice any party from applying, after issue is joined, to lay the venue in another county, if it shall appear that it may be more conveniently tried in such county.'

Secondly. 'That a defendant, on his affidavit to obtain the rule nisi to change the venue, or in support of a summons for that purpose before issue joined, should state all the circumstances on which he means to rely as the ground for the change of venue, but that he may, if he pleases, only rely on the fact that the cause of action arose in the county to which he seeks to have the venue changed, which ground shall be deemed sufficient, unless the plaintiff shows that the cause may be more conveniently tried in the county in which it was originally laid, or other good reason why the venue should not be changed.'—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 1339.

The court or a judge may, on the application of either party, order that the trial of an ejectment shall take place in any county or place other than that in which the venue is laid, and such order being suggested on the record, the trial may be had accordingly.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 182.

In criminal cases, the rule of the common law is that the venue shall be co-extensive with the jurisdiction of the court. By the common law the grand jury could not indict or present any offence which did not arise within the county or the precincts for which they were returned, but their jurisdiction has been extended by several modern statutes. It is now provided by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 23, that the name of the county, city, or other jurisdiction, shall be stated in the margin of the indictment, and that the name so stated shall be taken to be the venue of all the facts stated in the body of such indictment, unless the contrary shall expressly appear; but in cases where local description is necessary, this provision does not dispense with such description, and by s. 24 it is declared that no indictment shall be held insufficient for want of a proper or perfect venue. Local description will still be necessary in the following offences:—Nuisance to highways, keeping disorderly houses, arson, burglary, house-breaking, stealing in a dwelling-house, forcible entry, being armed at night in a close for the purpose of killing game, &c., and certain offences against 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19.

As to the venue in proceedings against persons for anything done in pursuance of the Larceny Act, see s. 113 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, or of the Malicious Injuries to Property Act, see s. 71 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, or of the Coin Act, see s. 33 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99.

Veray, true.

Verba accipienda sunt cum effectu—ut sortiantur effectum.—Bacon.—(Words are to be received with effect—so that they may produce that effect.)

Verba æquivoca, ac in dubio sensu posita, intelliguntur digniore et potentiore sensu.—6 Co. 20.—(Words equivocal, and placed in a doubtful sense, are to be taken in their more worthy and effective sense.)

Verba aliquid operari debent—debent intelligi ut aliquid operentur.—8 Co. 94.—(Words ought to have some operation; they ought to be interpreted in such a way as to have some operation.)

Verba chartarum fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem.—Co. Litt. 36.—(The words of charters are to be received more strongly against the grantor.)

Verba currentis monetæ, tempus solutionis designat.—Dav. 20.—(The words 'current money' designate current at the time of payment.)

Verba dicta de personâ intelligi debent de conditione personæ.—2 Rol. Rep. 72.—(Words spoken of the person are to be understood of the condition of the person.)

Verba generalia generaliter sunt intelligenda. 3 Inst. 76.—(General words are to be generally understood.)

Verba generalia restringuntur ad habilitatem

rei vel aptitudinem personæ.—Bacon.—(General words must be narrowed to the nature of the subject or the aptitude of the person.)

Verba illata in esse videntur.—(Words referred to are considered to be incorporated.)

Verba intentioni, non è contra, debent inservire.—8 Co. 94.—(Words ought to be made subservient to the intent, not contrary to it.)

Verba ita sunt intelligenda, ut res magis valeat quam pereat.—Bacon.—(Words are to be so understood as that the subject matter may be rather preserved than destroyed.)

Verba posteriora, propter certitudinem addita, ad priora quæ certitudine indigent sunt referenda.—Wing.—(Subsequent words, added for the purpose of certainty, are to be referred to preceding words which need certainty.)

Verba relata hoc maximè operantur per referentiam ut in eis inesse videntur.—Co. Litt. 359. (Words to which reference is made in an instrument have this especial operation that they are regarded as inserted in the clause referring to them.)

Verba semper accipienda sunt in mitiori sensu. 4 Co. 17.—(Words are always to be taken in their milder sense.)

Verbal note, a memorandum or note, in diplomacy, not signed, sent when an affair has continued a long time without any reply, in order to avoid the appearance of an urgency which, perhaps, is not required; and, on the other hand, to guard against the supposition that it is forgotten, or that there is no intention of not prosecuting it any further.)

Verderor, an officer in the royal forest, whose office is properly to look to the vert, and see it well maintained; and he is sworn to keep the assizes of the forest, and view, receive, and enrol the attachments, and presentments of trespasses of vert and venison, &c.—Manw. 332.

Verdict [fr. vere dictum, Lat.], the determination of a jury declared to a judge.

The verdict is either general or special. A general verdict is given, vivâ voce, by the jury, thus, 'we find for the plaintiff, damages ——, costs ——,' or, if for the defendant, then, 'we find for the defendant.' If there be several issues, the verdict may be distributed, some issues being found for the plaintiff and others for the defendant. A verdict must comprehend the whole issues submitted to a jury in the particular cause, otherwise the judgment founded upon it may be reversed. A special verdict must state the facts proved at the trial, and not merely the evidence given to prove those facts, otherwise it will be insufficient, and the court will award a trial de novo.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 448, et seq.

Verdicts in criminal cases may be either general, as guilty or not guilty; or special, setting forth all the circumstances, and praying the judgment of the court, whether, upon the facts stated, there exists a crime in law.—4 Step. Com. 518.

Veredictum, quasi dictum veritatis: ut judicium quasi juris dictum.—Co. Litt. 226.—(The verdict is, as it were, the dictum of truth: as the judgment is the dictum of law.)

Verge, or Virge, the compass of the Queen's court, which bounds the jurisdiction of the lord steward of the household; it seems to have been twelve miles about.—Brit. 68. A quantity of land from fifteen to thirty acres.—28 Edw. I. Also, a stick, or rod, whereby one is admitted tenant to a copyhold estate.—O. N. B. 17.

Vergelt, the Saxon fine for a crime. See WERGILD.

Vergers [portatores virgæ, Lat.; bedeau d'église, Fr.], those who carry white wands before the judges, or before church dignitaries.

Verification, confirmation by evidence. As a formal conclusion of a plea it is rendered unnecessary by C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 67.

Veritas, à quocunque dicitur, à Deo est.—4 Inst. 153.—(Truth, by whomsoever pronounced, is from God.)

Veritas demonstrationis tollit errorem nominis. 1 Ld. Raym. 303.—(The truth of the demonstration removes the error of the name.)

Veritas nihil veretur nisi abscondi.—9 Co. 20. (Truth fears nothing but concealment.)

Veritas nimium altercando amittitur.—Hob. 344.—(By too much altercation truth is lost.)

Veritas, quæ minime defensatur, opprimitur; et qui non improbat, approbat.—3 Inst. 27.—(Truth which is not sufficiently defended, is oppressed; and he who does not disapprove, approves.)

Veritatem qui non liberè pronunciat, proditor est veritatis.—4 Inst. Epil.—(He who does not freely speak the truth, is a betrayer of truth.)

Verna, a slave born in his master's house.—Civ. Law.

Versus [Lat.], abbrev. v. (against).

Vert [fr. verd, Fr.; viridis, Lat.], otherwise called greenhue, everything that bears a green leaf within a forest that may cover a deer; but especially great and thick coverts.

Manwood (part 2, p. 33) divides vert into overt-vert and nether-vert; the overt-vert is that which is termed haut-boys, and nether-vert, sub-boys; and into special vert, which is, all trees growing within the forest that bear fruit, to feed deer, because the destroying of it is more grievously punished than of any other vert.

Also, that power which a man has, by royal grant, to cut green-wood in a forest.

Also green color, called Venus in the arms of princes, and Emerald in those of peers, and expressed in engravings by lines in bend.—Heraldic term.

Very lord and very tenant [verus dominus et verus tenens, Lat.], they that are immediate lord and tenant one to another.

Vest, to place in possession; to make possessor of; to take an interest in property when a named period or event occurs.

Vesta, the crop on the ground.

Vested in interest, a legal term applied to a present fixed right of future enjoyment, as reversions, vested remainders, such executory devises, future uses, conditional limitations, and other future interests as are not referred to, or made to depend on, a period or event that is uncertain.

Vested legacy. See LEGACY.

Vested in possession, a legal term applied to a right of present enjoyment actually existing.

Vested remainder, an expectant estate, which is limited or transmitted to a person who is capable of receiving the possession, should the particular estate happen to determine; as a limitation to A. for life, remainder to B. and his heirs; here, as B. is in existence, he is capable (or his heirs, if he die) of taking the possession whenever A's death may occur. A vested estate may take effect though the preceding estate be defeated, as when an infant makes a lease for life with a remainder over, and on majority he disagree to the estate for life, yet the remainder is good, having been duly vested by a good title.—Fearne, C. R. 308.

The person who is entitled to a vested remainder having a present vested right of future enjoyment, i. e. an estate in præsenti, to take effect in possession and pernancy of the profits in futuro, can transfer, alien, and charge it much in the same manner as an estate in possession.—2 Cru. Dig. 204.

Vesting order. The Court of Chancery has the power of granting an order passing the legal estate in lieu of a conveyance, but such order must be stamped, as if it were a deed of conveyance, pursuant to 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55. Also commissioners appointed by several modern statutes have the powers, by vesting order, to transfer legal estates without the necessity of a deed of transfer.

Also before the abolition of the Insolvent Court, an order of that court, transferring an insolvent's property to the provisional assignee.

Vestry, or Vestiary, a place or room adjoining to a church, where the vestments of the minister are kept; also, a parochial assembly, commonly convened in the vestry, to transact the parish business.

A custom has obtained in large and populous parishes of yearly choosing a select number of the chief and most respectable parishioners to represent and manage the concerns of the parish for that year. They are called a select vestry.

Vestry clerk, an officer appointed to attend vestries, and take an account of their proceedings, &c.

Vestura, a crop of grass or corn.

Vesture, a garment; metaphorically applied to a possession or seisin.

Vetera Statuta, the ancient statutes, commencing with Magna Charta, and ending with those of Edward II., including also some which, because it is doubtful to which of the three reigns of Hen. III., Edw. I. or Edw. II. to assign them, are termed incerti temporis.—2 Reeves, c. viii., p. 85, and c. xii., p. 354.

Vetitum namium, or Repetitum namium, a second or reciprocal distress, in lieu of the first, which has been eloigned.

Veto, a prohibition, or the right of forbidding.

Vexata quæstio [Lat.], an undetermined point.

Vexatious suit, one brought without probable cause, for the purpose of annoyance or oppression. As to vexatious indictments, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17.

Via, the right to use a way for any purpose. Cum. C. L. 83.

Viability, a capability of living after birth; extra uterine life.

Viæ servitus (servitude of way), a right of road over another's land, or rather a Scottish tenure, by which such right accrues against the possessor of land.

Via Regia, the highway or common road, called the Queen's way, because under her protection. It was sometimes called via militaris.—Bract. l. 4.

Via trita est tutissima.—10 Co. 142.—(The beaten road is the safest.)

Vicarius non habet vicarium.—(A delegate cannot have a delegate.)

Vicar, one who performs the functions of another; a substitute. Also, the incumbent of an appropriated or impropriated benefice, as distinguished from the incumbent of a non-appropriated benefice, who is called a rector. See 3 Step. Com. 19.

Vicarage, the benefice of a vicar.

Vicarage teinds, small tithes.

Vicarial tithes, petty or small tithes payable to the vicar.

Vicario, &c. an ancient writ for a spiritual person imprisoned, upon forfeiture of a recognizance, &c.—Reg. Org. 147.

Vice-Admiral, an under-admiral at sea, or admiral on the coasts; a naval officer of the second rank.

Vice-Admiralty Courts, tribunals established in Her Majesty's possessions beyond the seas, with jurisdiction over maritime causes, including those relating to prize.

The Vice-Admiralty Courts Act, 1863 (26 Vict. c. 24), entitled 'An Act to facilitate the appointment of Admirals and of Officers in Vice-Admiralty Courts in Her Majesty's possessions abroad, and to confirm the past proceedings, to extend the jurisdiction and to amend the practice of those courts,' repeals 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 51, and other Acts. It enacts that in any British possession where the office of vice-admiral shall become vacant, the governor of such possession shall be ex-officio vice-admiral thereof until a notification is received that a formal appointment to the office has been made by the Admiralty (s. 3). In any British possession where the office of judge of a vice-admiralty court shall become vacant, the chief justice and principal judicial officer of such possession, or the person lawfully authorized to act as such, shall be ex-officio judge of the vice-admiralty court until a notification is received in the possession that a formal appointment has been made by the Admiralty (s. 4). The 5th sec. makes provision for a vacancy in the office of registrar or marshal. The 7th sec. reserves the right of the admiralty to appoint any vice-admiral, or any judge, registrar, marshal, or other officer of any vice-admiralty court as heretofore by warrant from the Admiralty and by letters patent issued under the seal of the High Court of Admiralty in England. Sec. 10 enacts that the matters in respect of which the vice-admiralty courts shall have jurisdiction are as follows:—

(1) Claims for seaman's wages.

(2) Claims for master's wages and for his disbursements on account of the ship.

(3) Claims in respect of pilotage.

(4) Claims in respect of salvage of any ship or of life or goods therefrom.

(5) Claims in respect of towage.

(6) Claims for damage done by any ship.

(7) Claims in respect of bottomry or respondentia bonds.

(8) Claims in respect of any mortgage where the ship has been sold by a decree of the vice-admiralty court, and the proceeds are under its control.

(9) Claims between the owners of any ship registered in the possession in which the court is established touching the ownership, possession, employment, or earnings of such ship.

(10) Claims for necessaries supplied in the possession in which the court is established to any ship of which no owner or part owner is domiciled within the possession at the time of the necessaries being supplied.

(11) Claims in respect of the building, equipping, or repairing, within any British possession, of any ship of which no owner or part owner is domiciled within the possession at the time of the work being done.

The 11th sec. enacts that the vice-admiralty courts shall also have jurisdiction—

(1) In all cases of breach of the regulations and instructions relating to Her Majesty's navy at sea.

(2) In all matters arising out of droits of admiralty.

Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to take away or restrict the jurisdiction conferred upon any vice-admiralty court by any Act of Parliament in respect of seizures for breach of the Revenue Customs Trade or Navigation Laws, or of the laws relating to the abolition of the slave trade, or to the capture and destruction of pirates or piratical vessels, or any other jurisdiction now lawfully exercised by any such court, or any jurisdiction now lawfully exercised by any other court within Her Majesty's dominions (sec. 12).

The jurisdiction of the vice-admiralty court, except where it is expressly confined by this act to matters arising within the possession in which the court is established may be exercised whether the cause or right of action has arisen within or beyond the limits of such possession (sec. 13).

Provisions are then made respecting the framing of rules and tables of fees (s. 14 to 18) and for the revision of taxations of costs in the vice-admiralty courts by the High Court of Admiralty (s. 19); power is given to registrars to administer oaths (s. 20); the mode of proceeding in cross suits of damage by collision is amended (s. 21); an appeal is given from vice-admiralty courts to Her Majesty in council (s. 22); the time for appeal is limited to six months from the date of the decree or order appealed from (s. 23); and previous Acts relating to vice-admiralty courts are repealed, save as regards Her Majesty's possessions in India, but regulations and tables of fees now in force under the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 51, are to continue in force until repealed or altered under this Act. A schedule to the Act contains a list of the existing vice-admiralty courts to which the Act applies. They are:—

Vice-Chamberlain, a great officer next under the Lord Chamberlain, who, in his absence, has the rule and control of all officers appertaining to that part of the royal household which is called the chamber above stairs.

Vice-Chancellor [fr. vicecancellarius, Lat.], a sub-chancellor.

Vice-Chancellors in Equity. There are three: the Vice-Chancellor of England, appointed by 53 Geo. III. c. 24, and two juniors, appointed by 5 Vict. c. 5, s. 19. Each of these sits separately from the lord chancellor and lords justices, to whom an appeal lies from their decisions. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 4, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, ss. 52–58.

Vice-Chancellor of the Universities. See CHANCELLOR OF THE UNIVERSITIES.

Vice-comes, a viscount; a sheriff.

Vicecomes dicitur quod vicem comitis suppleat. Co. Litt. 168.—('Vicecomes' (sheriff), is so called, because he supplies the place of the 'comes' (earl).)

Vice-comes non misit breve [Lat.] (the sheriff has not sent the writ). This continuance is abolished by r. 31, H. T. 1853.

Vice-Constable of England, an ancient officer in the time of the fourth Edward.

Vice-consul, one who acts for a consul; a sheriff.

Vice-dominus, a sheriff.—Ingulphus.

Vice-dominus episcopi, the vicar-general, or commissary of a bishop.—Blount.

Vice-gerent, a deputy or lieutenant.

Vice-marshal, an officer who was appointed to assist the Earl Marshal.

Vice-roy, the sovereign's lord-lieutenant over a kingdom, such as Ireland.

Vice-treasurer. See UNDER-TREASURER.

Vicinage [fr. voisinage, Fr.], neighbourhood, or near dwelling; places adjoining.

Vicini viciniora præsumuntur scire.—4 Inst. 173.—(Persons living in the neighbourhood are presumed to know the neighbourhood.)

Vicious intromission, a meddling with the moveables of a deceased, without confirmation or probate of his will, or other probable title.—Scotch phrase.

Vicis et venellis mundandis, an ancient writ against the mayor or bailiff of a town, &c. for the clean keeping of their streets and lanes. Reg. Orig. 267.

Vicountiel, or Vicontiel, anything that belongs to the sheriff, as vicontiel writs, i. e. such as are triable in the sheriff's court. As to vicontiel rents, see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99, ss. 12, 13, which places them under the management of the commissioners of the woods and forests.

Vicountiel jurisdiction, that jurisdiction which belongs to the officers of a county, as sheriffs, coroners, &c.

Victoria Colony. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 59; 18 & 19 Vict. cc. 55, 56; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 12.

Victoria Park. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 46.

Victualling houses. See PUBLIC HOUSES.

Vidame, a vavasor, which see.

Videbis ea sæpe committi quæ sæpe vindicantur.—3 Inst. Epil.—(You will see these things frequently committed which are frequently punished.)

Videlicet (to wit). See SCILICET.

Vidimus, an inspeximus, which see.—Barr. on Stat. 5.

Viduitatis professio, the making a solemn profession to live a sole and chaste woman.

Viduity, widowhood.

Vi et armis [Lat.] (with force and arms), words inserted in pleadings to express a forcible and violent act.

View, an inspection of property in controversy, or of a place, where a crime has been committed, by the jury previously to the trial.

A writ of view shall not be necessary or used, but, whether the view is to be had by a common or special jury, it shall be sufficient to obtain a rule of the court or judge's order, directing a view to be had; and the proceedings upon the rule for a view shall be the same as the proceedings heretofore had under a writ of view; and the sheriff, upon request, shall deliver to either party the names of the viewers, and shall also return their names to the associate for the purpose of their being called as jurymen upon the trial.—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 114.

The rule for a view may in all cases be drawn up by the officer of the court on the application of the party, without a motion for that purpose.—H. T. 1853, r. 48.

Upon any application for a view, there shall be an affidavit, stating the place at which the view is to be made, and the distance thereof from the office of the under-sheriff, and the sum to be deposited in the hands of the under-sheriff shall be 10*l.* in the case of a common jury, and 16*l.* in case of a special jury, if such distance do not exceed five miles; and 15*l.* in the case of a common jury, and 21*l.* in case of a special jury, if it be above five miles. And if such sum shall be more than sufficient to pay the expenses of the view, the surplus shall forthwith be returned to the attorney of the party who obtained the view; and if such sum shall not be sufficient to pay such expenses, the deficiency shall forthwith be paid by such attorney to the under-sheriff. And the under-sheriff shall pay and account for the money so deposited, according to the given scale (r. 49). Where a view has been had, the jurors who had it are to be called first upon the trial; and then other jurors must be called to make a complete jury.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 371.

View of frankpledge. See LEET.

Vifgage, vivum vadium, which see.

Vigil, the eve or next day before any solemn feast.

Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt. Wing. 692.—(Laws come to the assistance of the vigilant, not of the sleepy.)

Vi laicâ removendâ, a writ that lies where two persons contend for a church, and one of them enters into it with a great number of laymen, and holds out the other vi et armis; then he that is holden out shall have this writ addressed to the sheriff, that he remove the lay force; but the sheriff ought not to remove the incumbent out of the church, whether he is there by right or wrong, but only the force.—F. N. B. 54.

Vill, or Village, a manor; a parish; the outpart of a parish.

The following is the difference between a mansion, a village, and a manor; namely, a mansion may be of one or more houses, but it must be of one dwelling house, and none near to it; for if other houses are contiguous, it is a village; and a manor may consist of several villages, or one alone.—Fleta, l. 6, c. li.

Villa est ex pluribus mansionibus vicinata et collata ex pluribus vicinis, et sub appellatione villarum continentur burgi et civitates.—Co. Litt. 115.—(Vill is a neighborhood of many mansions, a collection of many neighbors, and under the term of vills, boroughs and cities are contained.)

Villa regia, a manor held by the Crown.

Villain or Villein [fr. vilis, Lat.], a man of base or servile condition; a bondman or servant; one who held by a base service.—1 Hall, M. A. c. ii. pt. 2, p. 199.

Villanis regis subtractis reducendis, a writ that lay for the bringing back of the king's bondmen, that had been carried away by others out of his manors, whereto they belonged.—Reg. Orig. 87.

Villein in gross, one annexed to the person of the lord, and transferable by deed from one owner to another.

Villein regardant, one annexed to the manor or land.

Villein services, base, but certain and demined services.

Villein socage, a holding of the king; a privileged sort of villenage.

Villenage, a base tenure.

There are two sorts:—1st, pure, where a man holds upon terms of doing whatsoever is commanded of him; and 2nd, privileged, otherwise called villein socage, which see. See also TENURE.

Villenous judgment [villanum judicium, Lat.], a judgment which deprived one of his liberam legem, whereby he was discredited and disabled as a juror or witness; forfeited his goods and chattels, and lands for life; wasted the lands, razed the houses, rooted up the trees, and committed his body to prison. It has become obsolete.—4 Bl. Com. 136.

Vim vi repellere licet, modo fiat moderamine inculpatæ tutelæ, non ad sumendam vindictam, sed ad propulsandam injuriam.—Co. Litt. 162. (It is lawful to repel force by force, but let it be done with the moderation of blameless defence; not to take revenge, but to repel injury.)

Vinagium [tributum à vino, Lat.], a payment of a certain quantity of wine, instead of rent for a vineyard.—2 Mon. Ang. 980.

Vinculo matrimonii, Divorce à. See A VINCULO MATRIMONII and MARRIAGE.

Vindex, a defender.—Civ. Law.

Vindicatio, a real action claiming property by its owner.—Civ. Law.

Vindicatory part of laws, the sanction of the laws, whereby it is signified what evil or penalty shall be incurred by such as commit any public wrongs, and transgress or neglect their duty.

Viol [old law Fr.], rape.—Barr. on Stat. 139.

Violation of safe conducts, an offence against the law of nations.—4 Step. Com. 297.

Violation of women. See RAPE.

Violent presumption, a strong presumption.

Violenta præsumptio aliquando est plena probatio.—Co. Litt. 6 b.—(Violent presumption is some times full proof.)

Violent profits, double value of a tenement within a burgh, and the highest rent for lands in the country, recoverable against a tenant for refusing to remove.—Scotch phrase.

Viperina est expositio quæ corrodit viscera textûs.—11 Co. 34.—(It is a bad exposition which destroys the vitals of the text.)

Vir et uxor censentur in lege una persona.—Jenk. Cent. 27.—(Husband and wife are considered one person in law.)

Vir et uxor sunt quasi unica persona, quia caro et sanguis una: res licet sit propria uxoris, vir tamen ejus custos, cum sit caput mulieris.—Co. Litt. 112.—(Man and wife are, as it were, one person, because only one flesh and blood; although the property may be the wife's, the husband is keeper of it, since he is the head of the wife.)

Virga, a rod or ensign of office.—Cowel.

Virgate, a yard-land.

Virge, Tenant by, a species of copyholder, who holds by the virge or rod.

Vir militans Deo non implicetur secularibus negotiis.—Co. Litt. 70.—(A man fighting for God ought not to be involved in secular business.)

Viridario eligendo, a writ for the choice of a verderer in the forest.—Reg. Orig. 177.

Virilia, the privy members of a man, to cut off which was felony by the common law, though the party consented to it.—Bract. l. 3, p. 144.

Vis [Lat.], any kind of force, violence, or disturbance to person or property. It was a vis armata, i. e. vis cum armis, or vis simplex, i. e. vis sine armis.—1 Reeves, c. vi., p. 322.

Visa, a register; the mode of authentication of an act.

Viscount or Vicount [fr. vicecomes, Lat.], an arbitrary title of honor, without any shadow of office pertaining to it, created by Henry VI. 2 Inst. 5. See Barr. on Stat. 409. A peer of the fourth order, between earl and baron.

Visitation, judicial visit or perambulation.

Visitation books of heralds, compilations, when progresses were solemnly and regularly made into every part of the kingdom, to inquire into the state of families, to register marriages and descents, which were verified to the heralds upon oath. They are allowed to be good evidence of pedigrees.

Visitor, an inspector of a college or corporation, or hospital. The Court of Chancery exercises the right of visitation on behalf of the Crown. As to visitors of lunatic asylums, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 22; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, ss. 61, 62; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 111, s. 30.

Visitor of manners, the regarder's office in the forest.—Manw. 195.

Vis legibus est inimica.—3 Inst. 176.—(Violence is inimical to the laws.)

Vis major, inevitable accident, irresistible force.

By inevitable accident, commonly called the act of God, is meant any accident produced by any physical cause, which is irresistible; such as a loss by lightning or storm, by the perils of the sea, by inundation or earthquake, or by sudden death or illness.

By irresistible force is meant such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and powers, absolutely uncontrollable.—Story's Bailments, 29.

Visne [fr. visnetum, Lat.], a neighbourhood.

Visus, view or inspection.

Vitilitigate, to litigate cavillously.

Vitium clerici nocere non debet.—Jenk. Cent. 23.—(A clerical error ought not to hurt.)

Vitium est quod fugi debet, ne si rationem non invenias, mox legem sine ratione esse clames.—Elles. Postn. 86.—(It is a fault which ought to be avoided, that if you cannot discover the reason, you should presently exclaim that the law is without reason.)

Viva pecunia [Lat.], cattle, which obtained this name from being received during the Saxon period as money upon most occasions, at certain regulated prices.

Vivary or Vivarye [fr. vivarium, Lat.], a place where animals are preserved; a park, warren, piscary, &c.—2 Inst. 100.

Vivâ voce (by word of mouth).

Vivum vadium, Vifgage or Living pledge, when a person borrows money of another, and grants to him an estate to hold till the rents and profits shall repay the sum borrowed, with interest. The estate is conditioned to be void as soon as the sum is realised. See WELSH MORTGAGE.

Vix ullâ lex fieri potest quæ omnibus commoda sit, sed si majori parti prospiciat utilis est.—Plow. 369.—(Scarcely any law can be made which is beneficial to all; but it is useful if it benefit the greater majority.)

Vocatio in jus, a citation to law.—Civil Law.

Vociferatio, an outcry; hue and cry.

Voidance, the act of emptying; ejection from a benefice.

Void and Voidable. There is this difference between these two words: void means that an instrument or transaction is so nugatory and ineffectual that nothing can cure it; voidable, when an imperfection or defect can be cured by the act or confirmation of him who could take advantage of it. Thus, while acceptance of rent will make good a voidable lease, it will not affirm a void lease.

The Court of Chancery has drawn this distinction between voidable and void contracts: with regard to the former, they will be decreed to be delivered up, since their retention is liable to be applied to improper purposes, such as future litigation, when lapse of time may have weakened or destroyed the means of defence; or since their existence uncancelled may cloud a title, or diminish its value and security; but as to void instruments, the illegality of which appears upon their face, equity does not interpose its authority, since their production at any period of time will plainly establish their nullity.

Voir dire [veritatem dicere, Lat.], examining a witness before he gives evidence in the cause, as to whether he be competent or interested in the cause or not. Lord Kenyon said that objections to the competency of witnesses never come too late, but may be made in any stage of the cause.—Stone v. Blackburne, 1 Esp. 37. Witnesses are not now incompetent on the ground of interest or infamy.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 85.

Voiture, carriage, transportation by carriage.

Volenti non fit injuria.—Plow. 501.—(An injury is not done to the willing.)

Volumus (we will), the first word of a clause in the royal writs, of protection and letters-patent.

Voluntarius dæmon, a drunkard.—Co. Litt. 247 a.

Voluntary, acting without compulsion; doing by design. When applied to a conveyance, it means that it is made merely on a good, and not on a valuable consideration. See FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

Voluntary answer, one filed by a defendant to a bill in equity, without being called upon to answer by the plaintiff.

Voluntary deposit, such as arises from the mere consent and agreement of the parties.—Story's Bailment, 47.

Voluntary jurisdiction, one exercised in matters admitting of no opposition, and by any judge at any time and in any place.—Scotch phrase.

Voluntary oath, an oath administered in a case for which the law has not provided. See 5. & 6 Wm. IV. c. 62.

Voluntary redemption, the receipt of his money by the wadsetter (mortgagee), who then voluntarily renounces.—Scotch phrase.

Voluntary waste, that which is active or wilful.

Voluntas donatoris in charta aoni sui manifestè expressa observetur.—Co. Litt. 21.—(The will of the donor manifestly expressed in his deed of gift is to be observed.)

Voluntas in delictis, non exitus spectatur.—2 Inst. 57.—(In crimes the will, and not the consequence, is looked to.)

Voluntas reputatur pro facto.—3 Inst. 69.—(The intention is to be taken for the deed.)

Voluntas testatoris est ambulatoria usque ad extremum vitæ exitum.—4 Co. 61.—(The will of a testator is ambulatory until death.)

Voluntas testatoris habet interpretationem latam et benignam.—Jenk. Cent. 260.—(The intention of a testator has a broad and benignant interpretation.)

Voluntas ultima testatoris est perimplenda secundum veram intentionem suam.—Co. Litt. 322.—(The last will of the testator is to be fulfilled according to his true intention.)

Volunteer, a person who receives a voluntary conveyance.

Also, a person who has voluntarily joined a corps raised either for home or foreign service; or for the purpose of being trained to act with the regular troops and the militia and yeomanry in defending the country in the event of invasion. The name of the Volunteer force is now generally applied to the body raised for the latter purpose in Great Britain. The laws relating to the Volunteer force in Great Britain have been consolidated and amended by the Volunteer Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 65), which repealed the statutes on the subject previously in force. This Act is divided into seven parts:—

Part 1. The organisation of the volunteer force.
Part 2. Actual military service.
Part 3. Discipline.
Part 4. Rules and property of corps.
Part 5. Acquisition of land for ranges.
Part 6. Exemptions.
Part 7. Miscellaneous provisions.

As to the raising and establishing a reserve Volunteer force of seamen, called Royal Naval Volunteers, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 40; also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 129, enabling Her Majesty to accept the services of officers of the merchant service as reserve officers to the royal navy. As to the Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 73, amended by 26 Vict. c. 5.

Vote, suffrage, voice given, and numbered.

Voter, a constituent, one who has the right of giving his voice or suffrage.

Votum, a vow or promise. Dies votorum, the wedding-day.—Fleta, l. 4.

Vouch, to give testimony, to obtest.

Vouche [fr. voco, Lat.], to call out, to warrant lands.

Vouchee, the person vouched in a writ of right.

Voucher, a witness, testimony, acquittance, or receipt.

Vraic, seaweed. It is used in great quantities by the inhabitants of Jersey and Guernsey for manure, and also for fuel by the poorer classes. In Benest v. Pipon, on appeal from Jersey to the Privy Council, it was ruled that the lord of a manor cannot establish a claim to the exclusive right of cutting seaweed on rocks situate below low-water mark, except by a grant from the Crown, or by such long and undisturbed enjoyment of it as to give him a title by prescription.—1 Knapp's P. C. Rep. p. 60, A.D. 1829.

Vulgar or Popular errors, erroneous notions. The following are instances:—

(1) That a funeral procession passing over private grounds creates a public right of way.

(2) That it is lawful to arrest and detain a dead body.

(3) That first cousins may intermarry, and that second cousins may not: whereas they may both marry with each other.

(4) That a surgeon or butcher cannot be sworn as a juryman.

(5) That all persons born at sea claim a right of settlement in Stepney parish.

(6) That a lease for more than ninety-nine years constitutes a freehold.

(7) That a husband is punishable for his wife's criminal acts.

(8) That to disinherit a child the sum of one shilling must be bequeathed.

(9) That the old statutes have prohibited the planting of vineyards; or the use of sawing-mills.

(10) That it is penal to open a coal-mine, or to kill a crow within five miles of London, or to shoot with a wind-gun, or to carry a dark lanthorn.

(11) That the sovereign signs the death-warrant (as it is called) for the execution of a criminal.

(12) That there is a statute which obliges the owners of asses to crop their ears, lest the length of them should frighten the horses which they meet on the road.

(13) That a woman by marrying a man under the gallows will save him from execution.

(14) That any one may be put into the Crown-office, for no cause whatever, or the most trifling injury.

(15) That there was not a land-tax before the reign of William III.

(16) That a man who marries a woman in debt, by taking her from the hands of the priest clothed only in her shift will not be liable to her engagements. See SELLING A WIFE, and CHASTISEMENT OF A WIFE.

(17) That it costs only thirteen-pence-halfpenny to be hanged.

Vulgaris opinio est duplex, viz. orta inter graves et discretos, quæ multum veritatis habet, et opinio orta inter leves et vulgares homines absque specie veritatis.—4 Co. 107.—(Common opinion is of two kinds, viz. that which arises among grave and discreet men, which has much truth in it, and that which arises among light and common men, without any appearance of truth.)

Wadset, a mortgage.—Scotch term.

Wadset improper, when the mortgagor pays the public burdens, the wadsetter (mortgagee) having his annual rents secured.

Wadset proper, when the wadsetter (mortgagee), takes his hazard of the rents of the land for satisfaction of his annual rent, and himself pays all public burdens.

Wadsetter, a mortgagee.

Waftors, conductors of vessels at sea.

Wage [fr. vador, Lat.; gage, Fr.], the giving of a security for the performance of anything.

Wager, Feigned issue on a. See FEIGNED ISSUE.

Wager of battel. See BATTEL.

Wager of law [fr. vadatio legis, Lat.], a proceeding which consisted in a defendant's discharging himself from the claim, on his own oath, bringing with him at the same time into court eleven of his neighbors to swear that they believed his denial to be true. It was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 13.

Wagering policies, those effected for gambling purposes, which are void by 14 Geo. III. c. 48. See 19 Geo. III. c. 37. See DOUBLE INSURANCE.

Wagers. See GAMING.

It is well established at common law, that a wager is a legal contract, which the courts are bound to enforce, although it be in respect of a matter which is trifling, or in which the parties have no interest; but if it be on a subject which is illegal, or which offends against public policy, it is void. And wagers which tend to affect the feelings and interests of third parties, or lead to indecent exposures and examinations, or are, in any manner, contra bonos mores, are void.—Story's Contracts, 127. But by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, ss. 17–19 are void.

Wages, the compensation agreed upon by a master to be paid to a servant, or any other person hired to do work or business for him.

An infant can recover wages under 50*l.* in the County Court, without a next friend.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 64.

As to the futility of laws for their regulation, see 3 Hall. M. A. c. viii., pt. 3, p. 178; and 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. c. xi., p. 409, et seq.

Waggessum, a doubtful word, perhaps Mussel Ouze. See Re Alston's estate, 5 W. R. 189.

Waggonage, money paid for carriage in a waggon.

Waif or Waift, Weif or Weft [waiviatum, law Lat.], goods found but claimed by nobody; that of which every one waives the claim. Also goods stolen and waived, or thrown away by the thief in his flight, for fear of being apprehended. These are given to the sovereign by the law, as a punishment upon the owner for not himself pursuing the felon and taking away his goods from him.—Cro. Eliz. 694.

Wainable, land that may be ploughed, manured or tilled.—Chart. Antiq.

Wainagium or Wanagium, the countenance of a villein; that which is necessary for the cultivation of land.—Barr. on Stat. 12; 4 Step. Com. 530. See CONTENEMENT.

Wain-bote, timber for waggons or carts.

Waiting-clerks in Chancery. Their offices were abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Waive, to forsake; to put a woman out of the protection of the law. See OUTLAWRY.

Waiver, the passing by of a thing, or a declining or refusal to accept it; also, declining to take advantage of irregularities in proceedings.

Wakeman [quasi, watchman], the chief magistrate of Ripon, in Yorkshire.—Camden.

Wakening, a citation narrating that a complainer has raised a summons which he had let sleep for a year and a day, concluding that all persons cited on the first should compear, hear, and see the aforesaid action called, awakened, and debated, till sentence be given.—Scotch term.

Wales, a principality in the west of the island of Great Britain. After Edward I. conquered Wales, the line of their ancient princes was abolished, and the King of England's eldest son was created their titular prince, and the territory of Wales was then entirely annexed to the British Crown. The 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26, confirmed by 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 36, gave the utmost advancement to their civil prosperity, by admitting them to a thorough communion of laws with the subjects of England. By 20 Geo. II. c. 42, it is declared that where England only is mentioned in any Act of Parliament, it shall be deemed to comprehend the dominion of Wales and town of Berwick-upon-Tweed. By 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, the jurisdiction of the court of Great Sessions was abolished, and assizes are now held there as in England. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 32. By 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, three of its counties respectively send two members to the House of Commons, and each of the remaining counties one. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 11, the manner of assigning sheriffs in Wales is regulated by and assimilated to that of England. See 1 Step. Com. 85. The 26 & 27 Vict. c. 82, empowers the Bishops of Welsh dioceses to facilitate the making provision for English services in certain parishes in Wales.

Wales, Prince and Princess of. See PRINCE AND PRINCESS.

Wales, Statute of, 12 Edw. I. A.D. 1284.—2 Reeves, c. ix., p. 95.

Waleschery, the being a Welshman.

Waliscus [servus, Lat.], a servant, or any other ministerial officer.

Walkers, foresters, who have the care of a certain space of ground assigned to them.

Waltham Black Act, 9 Geo. I. c. 22. As to setting fire to houses, mills, &c. see BLACK ACT.

Waltham Forest. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 81.

Wanlass, an ancient customary tenure of lands, i. e. to drive deer to a stand that the lord may have a shot.—Blount's Tenures, 140.

Wanton and furious driving, an offence against public health.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 35, it is provided that if any person having the charge of any carriage or vehicle shall, by wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct or neglect, do or cause to be done any bodily harm to any person whatsoever, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be imprisoned, with or without hard labor, for any term not exceeding two years. In addition to, or in lieu of, such punishment, the court may, if it thinks fit, under s. 71, fine the offender, or require him to enter into his own recognizances, and to find sureties both or either for keeping the peace and being of good behaviour. This Act, however, must be taken as declaratory only of the common law, in the cases to which it refers, for at common law it is a misdemeanor, and may even amount to manslaughter or murder, for any person to drive or ride so wantonly and furiously as to endanger the passengers on the highway.—4 Step. Com. 363.

Wapentake, or Wapentachium, a hundred, as, upon a meeting for that purpose, they touched each other's weapons in token of their fidelity and allegiance. Others think that it was ten hundreds or boroughs.—Encyc. Lond.; Ellis's Domesday, 182.

War, a contention by force; a fighting between two kings, princes, or parties, in vindication of what they conceive to be their just rights. The sovereign has the sole prerogative of making war or peace.

War, Articles of, see ARTICLES OF WAR.

War, levying against the sovereign, a species of treason. See TREASON.

Ward, the state of a child under guardianship. A ward of court is an infant under the protection of the Court of Chancery. See INFANT. Also, the district of a city, town, parish, or borough, see 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76; and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 103. Also see WATCH AND WARD.

Warda, the custody of a town or castle, which the inhabitants were bound to keep at their own charge.—Mon. Ang.

Wardage, money paid and contributed to watch and ward.—Domesday.

Warden, guardian or keeper. The Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports is prohibited from recommending to those places members of Parliament, by 2 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 7. As to wardens of the society of Apothecaries, see 55 Geo. III. c. 194.

Ward-holding, the ancient military tenure in Scotland. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Wardmote, a court held in every ward in London.

The wardmote inquest has power to inquire into and present all defaults concerning the watch and police doing their duty, to see that engines, &c., are provided against fire, that persons selling ale and beer be honest and suffer no disorders, nor permit gaming, &c., that they sell in lawful measures; searches are to be made for beggars, vagrants, and idle persons, &c., who shall be punished.

Ward-penny, wardage, which see.

Wards and Liveries, Court of, a court erected by Henry VIII. and abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Wardship, pupillage, guardianship; an incident to tenure in socage. See TENURE.

Wardship in chivalry, an incident to the tenure of knight-service. See Ibid.

Wardship in copyholds, the lord is guardian of his infant-tenant by special custom.

Wardstaff, a watchman's staff.

Wardwit, the being quit of giving money for the keeping of wards.

Warectare, to plough up land designed for wheat in the spring, in order to let it lie fallow for better improvement, which in Kent is called summer-land.

Warehousing system, the allowing of goods imported to be deposited in public warehouses, at a reasonable rent, without payment of the duties on importation if they are re-exported; or if they are ultimately withdrawn for home consumption, without payment of such duties until they are so removed, or a purchaser found for them.—2 Mill's Pol. Eco. 444; 2 Step. Com. 587; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, ss. 85–100. As to warehousing ports, see s. 10. See also 23 & 24 Vict. c. 36.

Wargus, a banished rogue.

Warncistura, garniture, furniture, provision, &c.

Warning of a caveat, a notice to a person who has entered a caveat in the Probate Court to appear and set forth his interest.

Warnoth, an ancient custom, that if any tenant holding of the castle of Dover failed in paying his rent at the day, he should forfeit double, and for his second failure treble; and the lands so held are called terræ cultæ et terræ de warnoth.—Mon. Angl. ii. 589.

Warrandice, warranty.— Scotch term.

Warrant, a precept under hand and seal, to some officer to arrest an offender, to be dealt with according to due course of law; also, a writ conferring some right or authority, a citation or summons.

Warrantizare est defendere et acquietare tenentem, qui warrantam vocavit, in seisinâ suâ; et tenens de re warranti excambium habebit ad valentiam.— Co. Litt. 365.—(To warrant is to defend and insure in peace the tenant who calls for warranty in his seisin; and the tenant in warranty will have an exchange in proportion to its value.)

Warranty is abolished.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. cc. 27, 74.

Warrantus potest excipere quod querens non tenet terram de quâ petit warrantiam, et quod donum fuit insufficiens.—Hob. 21.—(A warranter may except, that the complainant does not hold the land of which he seeks the warranty, and that the gift was insufficient.)

Warrant of Attorney, a written authority addressed to an attorney or attorneys of the court in which it is intended that a judgment shall be entered up, authorizing them, or one of them, to appear for the party executing it, and receive a declaration for him in an action brought or to be brought against him, at the suit of a person therein mentioned, and thereupon to confess the same, or to suffer judgment to pass by default; it also authorizes the attorney or attorneys to execute a release of errors touching the judgment so to be entered up. The instrument must then be under seal, which is not absolutely necessary where it merely authorizes a judgment to be confessed. The law is, that a release of errors must be by deed, and an attorney to execute a deed must, as we have seen, always be appointed by an instrument of as high a nature. A warrant of attorney may be executed as a security for the performance of any agreement between the parties; but it does not extinguish an original debt, or affect the right to sue upon it, unless judgment have been signed, for until this is done it is merely a collateral security. If an infant or feme covert, or other incapacitated person, execute a warrant of attorney jointly with others it can only be set aside as against such infant, feme covert, or incapacitated person. It is usual to make the warrant subject to be defeated on the performance of certain conditions, and when this is the case, they are set forth in an agreement, hence called the defeasance. No particular form of defeasance is necessary; but it should be clear and complete, for parol evidence to extend its term cannot be admitted.—By the Practice Rules of the Common Law Courts, H. T. 1853, r. 27. Every attorney or other person who shall prepare any warrant of attorney to confess judgment which is to be subject to any defeasance shall cause such defeasance to be written on the same paper or parchment on which the warrant is written, or cause a memorandum in writing to be made on such warrant, containing the substance and effect of such defeasance. By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 9, after reciting that it is expedient that provision should be made for giving every person executing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment or a cognovit actionem, due information of the nature and effect thereof, it is enacted, that from and after the 1st of October, 1838, no warrrant of attorney to confess judgment in any personal action or cognovit actionem, given by any person, shall be of any force, unless there shall be present some attorney of one of the superior courts on behalf of such person, expressly named by him and attending at his request, to inform him of the nature and effect of such warrant or cognovit before the same is executed, which attorney shall subscribe his name as a witness to the due execution thereof, and thereby declare himself to be attorney for the person executing the same, and state that he subscribes as such attorney. And the 10th section enacts, that a warrant of attorney, or cognovit actionem, not executed in manner aforesaid, shall not be rendered valid by proof that the person executing the same did, in fact, understand the nature and effect thereof, or was fully informed of the same. These provisions do not extend to warrants of attorney given by insolvent debtors to enter up judgment for the amount of debts in their schedule (sec. 87). The defendant's attorney must not be the plaintiff's attorney, or his agent, or his clerk; he must be wholly unconnected with the opposite side. The same attorney may act for all the defendants. If a defendant be an attorney, of course he acts for himself. An insufficient attestation renders the document utterly void.

The death of either party is generally an implied revocation of the warrant, but the court may order judgment to be entered up after the death of the plaintiff, if the warrant authorize it to be done, by the plaintiff's representatives. If one or more of several plaintiffs die, judgment may be signed by the survivors, though the warrant be silent on the point. But the warrant cannot authorize the signing of judgment against the defendant's executors after his death; such a clause would be void, for the warrant then stands revoked. If one of several joint defendants die, the warrant is wholly revoked; but if they be joint and several, judgment may be signed against the survivors. If a feme sole give a warrant of attorney, and afterwards marry, the court will allow the judgment to be entered up against the husband and wife. If a warrant of attorney be given to a feme sole, and she afterwards marry, the judgment will be allowed to be entered up in the name of the husband and wife; but a warrant to a feme covert is utterly void. If the warrant of attorney be obtained by fraud, duress, or misrepresentation, or upon an illegal, or immoral consideration, the court will order it to be delivered up to be cancelled, and will set aside all proceedings had upon it, and so, if a material alteration be made in it after execution, and without the defendant's consent, and even when made with his consent, it must be again executed and attested, otherwise it will be invalid. The warrant may be good in part and bad in part, when the court will sustain it quoad the good part. If the fact of the consideration be doubtful the court may direct an issue to try it. By 3 Geo. IV. c. 39, ss. 1, 2, the warrant of attorney, or a true copy thereof, and of the attestation thereof, and the defeasance and indorsements thereon, and an affidavit of the time of the execution of such warrant of attorney, must be filed with the master within twenty-one days after the day of its execution, to render such warrant of attorney, or any judgment or execution thereon, valid as against the assignees of the defendant, if he should become bankrupt, unless judgment be signed and execution issued within the twenty-one days. If the defeasance be not written on the warrant, it is void as against assignees of bankrupts (sec. 4); but not as against any other person. The 7 Geo. IV. c. 57, s. 33, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 60, extended these provisions in favor of the creditors of an insolvent debtor. If a defendant become bankrupt before judgment it will be useless to proceed, because, in order to render any execution on a judgment founded on a warrant of attorney valid, so as to entitle the execution creditor to retain the proceeds of it against the assignees, it is essential not only that the execution should have been perfected both by seizure and sale of the bankrupt's goods before the date of the filing of the petition for adjudication; but also that such seizure and sale should have taken place at a time when the execution-creditor had no notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 112, ss. 135, 136, as to bankrupts; and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 61, as to insolvents. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 66, prevents frauds upon creditors by secret warrants of attorney, and provides that in addition to the book directed to be kept by 3 Geo. IV. c. 39, s. 5, and which might be inspected for sixpence, another book or index shall be kept, containing the names, additions, and descriptions of the respective defendants, or persons giving such warrants of attorney, or a cognovit actionem, but containing no further particulars thereof; which book may be inspected by any person on payment of one shilling, in addition to the aforesaid sixpence. The Common Law Rules of Practice, 25 & 26, provide that no judgment shall be signed upon any cognovit, or any warrant of attorney, without such cognovit or warrant being delivered to and filed by the master, who is thereby ordered to file the same in the order in which it is received. Leave to enter up judgment on a warrant of attorney above one and under ten years old, is to be obtained by order of a judge made ex parte, and if ten years old or more, upon a summons to show cause. See 1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren. 938, et seq.

Warrantee, a person to whom a warranty is made.

Warrantia chartæ, a writ, where one was enfeoffed of lands with warranty, and then he was sued or impleaded in assize or other action in which he could not vouch or call to warranty. F. N. B. 134. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Warrantia diei, an ancient writ, where one having a day assigned personally to appear in court to any action, is in the meantime employed in the royal service, so that he cannot come on the day appointed; it was addressed to the justices to this end, that they neither take nor record him in default for that time.—F. N. B. 17.

Warrantor, a person who warrants; the heir of one's husband.

Warranty, a guaranty or security; also a promise or covenant by deed by the bargainor for himself and his heirs, to warrant and secure the bargainee and his heirs against all persons for the enjoying of the thing granted.—2 Bl. Com. c. xx.

Warranty of lands is altogether superseded in practice by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. cc. 27, 74.

The general rule of law applicable to all sales of goods is, that the buyer buys at his own risk; caveat emptor; unless the vendor give an express warranty, or unless the law imply a warranty from the nature of the thing sold, and the circumstances of the sale; or unless the vendor have been guilty of a fraudulent representation or concealment in regard to the things sold.

Express Warranty.—Every affirmation made by the vendor at the time of the sale in relation to the goods, amounts to a warranty, provided it appear in evidence to be so intended. Where an express warranty is couched in technical terms, it is to be interpreted according to their technical signification, unless they be manifestly used in a different sense, and differently understood by the buyer. A general warranty does not extend to patent defects which are apparent upon due inspection, or to defects which are at the time known to the buyer.

Implied Warranty.—A warranty is implied in five cases:—(1) A warranty of title will be presumed when the goods sold are, at the time of the sale, in the possession of the vendor or of a third person, unless the contrary be then expressed; (2) when an examination of goods is, from their nature or situation at the time of the sale, impracticable, a warranty will be implied that they are merchantable; (3) upon an executory contract of sale, where goods are to be manufactured, or to be procured for a particular use or purpose, a warranty will be implied that they are reasonably fit for such purpose or use, as far as goods of such a kind can be; (4) a warranty will be implied against all latent defects in two cases: 1st, when the seller knew that the buyer did not rely on his own judgment, but on that of the seller, who knew at the time, or might have known, the existence of the defects; 2nd, where from the situation of the parties (as in the case of a manufacturer or producer), the seller might have provided against the existence of defects; or where a warranty may be presumed from the very nature of the transaction; (5) where goods are sold by sample, a warranty is implied that the bulk corresponds to the sample in nature and quality.—Story's Contracts, 329.

Warren [fr. waerande, Dut.; guerenne, Fr.], a franchise or place privileged by prescription or grant from the Crown, for the keeping of beasts or fowls of warren.—1 Inst. 233.

Warscot, a contribution usually made towards armour in the time of the Saxons.

Warth, a customary payment for castle-guard.

Wash, a shallow part of a river or arm of the sea.

Washhouses, Public. See PUBLIC BATHS.

Washing-horn [fr. corner l'eau, Fr.], the sounding of a horn for washing before dinner. The custom is still observed in the Temple.

Waste [fr. vastum, Lat.], any spoil or destruction in houses, gardens, trees, &c. to the prejudice of the expectant in fee. It is either (1) legal, subdivided into (a) voluntary or commissive, or (b) permissive or omissive (which is not however enjoinable [see Powys v. Blagrave, 2 Eq. Rep. 395 (1854), affirmed on appeal, 2 Ib. 1204 (1854)]); and (2) equitable, which comprehends acts not deemed waste at the common law. The prayer of the bill in Chancery should be to stay waste, either threatened or which the party is in the act of committing, and for an account of such waste as may have been already done. The most ordinary instance in which an injunction is granted is to restrain the committing of waste by a tenant for life or for years, upon the application of the owner of the inheritance. A mortgagee in possession will be restrained from cutting down timber, and so will a mortgagor in possession; for as the whole estate is the security for the money advanced, the mortgagor ought not to be suffered to diminish it; but he may cut underwood at seasonable times and of a proper growth. Trustees to preserve contingent remainders may, and it is their duty to enjoin a tenant for life from committing waste to the prejudice of the cestui que trust in remainder. Equitable waste being an unconscious abuse of the privilege of non-impeachability for waste at common law, a tenant for life without impeachment of waste, and a tenant-in-tail after possibility of issue extinct, will be restrained from committing wilful, destructive, malicious, extravagant, or humorous waste, such as pulling down houses, cutting timber of too young a growth, or trees planted for ornament, or for shelter of premises; for, though in some cases fortior est dispositio legis quam hominis, yet that shall not extend to encumber or spoil estates.—Vane v. Lord Barnard, 2 Vern. 738 (1716).

Wastors, thieves.

Watch and Ward. Ward [custodia, Lat.] is chiefly applied to the day time, in order to apprehend rioters and robbers on the highways. Watch [fr. wacht or wacta, Teut.] is applicable to the night only, and begins at the time when ward ends. By the Statute of Winchester the high constable is to keep watch and ward within his jurisdiction.—1 Bl. Com. 356.

As to levying borough rates and watch rates, see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 90; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 104; 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. cc. 78, 81; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 28; 3 & 4 Vict. cc. 28, 88; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 110; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 65; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81; and 17 & 18 Vict. 71.

Watchmen, constables; guardians of the peace by night.

They may arrest all offenders, and particularly night walkers, and commit them to custody till the morning.—13 Edw. I. c. 4.

Water, in the language of the law, a species of land (solecism though it be).—2 Bl. Com. 18.

An action cannot be brought to recover possession of a pool or other piece of water by the name of water only, but it must be brought for the land that lies at the bottom, e.g. 'twenty acres of land covered with water.'—Brownl. 142. See POOL.

By granting a certain water, though the right of fishing passes, yet the soil does not. Water being a movable wandering thing, there can only be a temporary transient usufructuary property therein. 'Water' does not include the land on which it stands; unless perhaps in the case of salt pits or springs, where the interest of each owner is measured by ballaries or buckets of brine.—Burt. Comp. pl. (550).

Water-bailiff, an officer in port-towns, whose duty is to search ships.

Watercourse, a species of incorporeal hereditament, being a right which one has to the benefit of the flow of a river or stream, such right commonly referring to a stream passing through one's own land, and the banks of which belong either to himself on both sides, or to himself on one side, and to his neighbor on the other, in which latter case (unless the stream be navigable, for then the bed of it, so far at least as the tide of the sea flows, presumably belongs to the Crown) the proprietor of each bank is considered as primâ facie the proprietor also of half the land covered by the stream, i. e. usque medium filum aquæ.

A prescriptive primâ facie right to watercourses and ways is gained by twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment, and an indefeasible right after forty years; and when the land over which such rights as these are claimed has been held for term of life, or a term exceeding three years, such term shall be excluded from the computation of the forty years, in the event of the person who may be entitled in reversion resisting the claim within three years after the term determines.—2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71. See Gale on Easements, by Willes.

Water-gage, a sea-wall or bank to restrain the current and overflowing of the water; also an instrument to measure water.

Water-gang, a trench or course to carry a stream of water.

Water-gavil, a rent paid for fishing in, or other benefit received from, some river.

Water-measure, a greater measure than the Winchester, formerly used for selling coals in the pool, &c.—22 Car. II. c. 11.

Watermen. See THAMES WATERMEN.

Water-ordeal. See COLD-WATER-ORDEAL and HOT-WATER-ORDEAL.

Waterscape, an aqueduct or passage for water.

Water supply to metropolis. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 84.

Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1863, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 17; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 93.

Waveson, goods swimming upon the waves after a shipwreck.

Waxscot [fr. cerarium, Lat.], duty anciently paid twice a year towards the charge of wax candles in churches.—Spelm.

Way [fr. wæg, Sax.; weigh, Dut.; vig or wig, M. Goth.], road made for passengers.

There are three kinds of ways:—1st, a footway (iter); 2nd, a park and prime way, which is both a horse and footway (actus); 3rd, a cart way (via or aditus), which is called via regia, if it be common to all men; and communis strata, if it belong to only some town or private person.—Co. Litt. 56 a.

All ways are divided into highways and private ways. A right of way strictly means a private way, i. e. a privilege which an individual or a particular description of persons may have of going over another's ground. Such a right is an incoporeal hereditament.

A highway is a public passage for the sovereign and all her subjects, and it is commonly called the Queen's public highway. Besides the ordinary highways, turnpike roads have been created, and regulated by specific Acts of Parliament. See TURNPIKE-ROADS. Highways generally become so by what is called a dedication of them to the public by the owner of the soil, but the public may also acquire the use of a highway by Act of Parliament.

As highways are for public service, if they are so out of repair that the usual track is impassable, it is allowed for the general good, that people should be entitled to pass, by going out of the track, even upon the land of the owners of the adjoining closes; but this privilege is exclusively confined to highways; for as private ways are all presumed to have originated in grants from the owner of the soil, the want of repair, amounting to what is called in law a founderous state, does not authorize passengers to go out of the way upon the adjacent land.

The inhabitants of a parish are primâ facie bound to repair a highway of common right; unless by prescription they can throw the burden on particular persons by reason of their tenure; and if the inhabitants of a township, bound by prescription to repair, be expressly exempted by an Act of Parliament from repairing the roads to be made within the township, it falls on the rest of the parish.

By the General Highway Act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50, power is given of stopping up and diverting highways, and the mode of proceeding to effect this object is pointed out. Parties grieved have a right of appeal to the sessions.

Bridges are public highways. See BRIDGE.

A navigable river is esteemed to be a highway; and if the water, which is the highway, change its course and flow upon the land of another, the highway extends over the place where the water newly flows, in like manner as it existed over the ancient course, so that the owner may not disturb it. With respect to navigable rivers there is this difference, however, between them and highways, that the right to the soil of a navigable river is not, by presumption of law, in the owners of the adjoining lands.

Ferries may be said to be common highways, as they are a common passage over rivers. They differ, however, in some measure, as they are the private property of individuals, who may maintain an action for the disturbance of their rights.

A private right of way may be claimed by prescription and immemorial usage; thus, where the inhabitants of a particular hamlet, or the owners or occupiers of a particular close or farm, have immemorially been used to cross a particular piece of land, a right of way is created by the immemorial usage, which supposes a grant. By 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71, s. 2, it is enacted, that no claim by custom, prescription, or grant to any way or other easement, or to any watercourse, or the use of any water which has been enjoyed twenty years without interruption, shall be defeated by showing the commencement of the right within the time of legal memory; and where the right shall have existed forty years, it shall be absolute and indefeasible, unless it appear to have been enjoyed by license, by deed, or writing. The right mush be proved by user down to the time of the commencement of the action; and therefore, if there be no proof of user for the last four or five years, it is insufficient. Unity of possession operates as an extinguishment of a right by way of prescription.

A private right of way may also be grounded on a special permission; as when the owner of lands grants to another a liberty of passing over his grounds, to go to church, market, or the like, in which case the gift or grant is particular and confined to the grantee alone; it dies with the person; the grantee cannot assign it, or justify taking another person in his company.

A right of way may also arise by act and operation of law; for if a man grant a piece of ground in the middle of his field, he at the same time tacitly and impliedly gives a way to come at it, and the grantee may cross the grantor's land without being a trespasser. A way of necessity is limited by the necessity which created it; and when such necessity ceases, the right of way also ceases.

Disturbance of ways happens when a person, who has a right of way over another's grounds, by grant or prescription, is obstructed by inclosures or other obstacles, or by ploughing across it, by which means he cannot enjoy the right of way, or at least not in so commodious a manner as he might have done. The remedy is usually by action on the case for damages. A right of way is often contested in an action of trespass. The remedy for the want of repair or obstruction to public highways is by indictment.—Woodf. Land. and Ten. 597; 2 Selw. N. P. 1315; Gale on Easements, by Willes.

Way-bill, a writing in which is set down the names of passengers who are carried in a public conveyance, or the description of goods sent with a common carrier by land.

Way-going crops. See AWAY-GOING CROPS.

Waynagium, implements of husbandry.—1 Reeves, c. v., p. 268.

Ways and Means, Committee of. As the Committee of Supply in the House of Commons relates to the expenditure of the nation, so the functions and duties of a Committee of Ways and Means have reference to the funds by which such expenditure is to be sustained. Loans, duties, taxes, tolls, and every kind of means for raising revenue, are submitted to a Committee of Ways and Means (which is always one of the whole House). The propositions of Government on these subjects are reduced to the form of resolutions, considered, decided on, and, such as are agreed to, reported to the House. Those which may be there adopted are embodied into bills, and in due course become law. As in the case of supply, the Lords may reject, but cannot modify, neither can their lordships insert pecuniary penalties in any bill whatever.—Dod's Par. Comp.

Weald, Wald, Walt [Sax.], a wood or grove.

Wealreaf, the robbing of a dead man in his grave.

Wealth, all useful or agreeable things which possess exchangeable value, or, in other words, all useful or agreeable things except those which can be obtained in the quantity desired, without labor or sacrifice.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 10. 'Wealth,' says Hobbes, 'is power!'

Wear, or Weir, a great dam or fence made across a river, or against water, formed of stakes interlaced by twigs of osier, and accommodated for the taking of fish, or to convey a stream to a mill.

Wed [Sax.], a covenant or agreement.—Cowel.

Wedbedrip, the customary service which inferior tenants paid to their lords in cutting down their corn, or doing other harvest duties.

Wedding-rings. As to the assaying and marking of gold wedding rings, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 60, s. 1.

Weighage, a toll or duty paid for weighing merchandise.

Weights and Measures, instruments for reducing the quantity and price of merchandise to a certainty, that there may be the less room for deceit and imposition. See AVOIRDUPOIS, and TROY WEIGHT.

The adjustment of weights and measures is a prerogative of the Crown. See 5 Geo. IV. c. 74; 6 Geo. IV. c. 12; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 29; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 72; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 56; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 146; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 79; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, s. 6 (as to the appointment of inspectors of weights and measures in municipal boroughs); and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 76, as to Ireland. Weights of Auncel. See AUNCEL WEIGHT.

Welch mortgage [now rare], a conveyance of an estate redeemable at any time by the mortgagor, on payment of the loan; the rents and profits of the estate being received in the meantime by the mortgagee, in satisfaction of interest, subject however to an account in Chancery. There is no covenant for the repayment of the loan, and the mortgagee cannot compel either redemption or foreclosure. A Welch mortgage differs from a vivum vadium or vif-gage, which is a conveyance of property to the creditor and his heirs, until out of the rents and profits of the estate he has satisfied the debt with interest: it was so called because neither debt nor estate was lost. The distinction between these securities is, that in the vif-gage the profits are applied in periodical reduction of the debt, while in the Welch mortgage they are applied in satisfaction of the interest, the principal remaining undiminished. In neither, however, is the estate ever forfeited.

Wend, a certain quantity or circuit of land.

Were [capitis æstimatio], a pecuniary compensation for an injury. See WITE.

Werelada, a purging from a crime by the oaths of several persons, according to the degree and quality of the accused.

Wergild, Weregild, Weregildum [fr. wer, man, and geld, satisfaction, Ang.-Sax.], the price of homicide or other enormous offences, paid partly to the Crown for the loss of a subject, partly to the lord whose vassal he was, and partly to the party injured or the next of kin of the party slain. This is the earliest award of damages in our law.—4 Bl. Com. 188. Obsolete Saxon custom.

Westminster, a city by express creation of Henry VIII. It was dissolved as a see and restored to the bishopric of London by Edward VI. and turned into a collegiate church, subject to a dean, by Queen Elizabeth.

Westminster the First, 3 Edw. I. A.D. 1275. This statute, which deserves the name of a Code rather than an Act of Parliament, is methodically divided into fifty-one chapters. Without extending the exemption of churchmen from civil jurisdiction, it protects the property of the church from the violence and spoliation of the king and the nobles, to which it had been exposed. It provides for freedom of popular elections, then a matter of much moment, as sheriffs, coroners, and conservators of the peace were still chosen by the freeholders in the county court, and attempts had been made unduly to influence the election of knights of the shire, almost from the time when the order was instituted. It contains a strong declaration to enforce the enactment of Magna Charta against excessive fines, which might operate as perpetual imprisonment. It enumerates and corrects the great abuses of tenures, particularly with regard to the marriage of wards. It regulates the levying of tolls, which were imposed in an arbitrary manner, not only by the barons, but by cities and boroughs. It corrects and restrains the powers of the king's escheator and other officers under the Crown. It amends the criminal law, putting the crime of rape on the footing to which it has been lately restored, as a most grievous, but not a capital offence. It embraces the subject of procedure, both in civil and criminal matters, introducing many regulations with a view to render it cheaper, more simple, and more expeditious.—Lord Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors, v. i., p. 167; 2 Reeves, c. ix., p. 107.

Westmoreland, the shrievalty of, was hereditary in the family of the Earl of Thanet, and descended to females as well as males. Anne, Countess of Pembroke, exercised this office in person, and, at the assizes at Appleby, sat with the judges on the bench.—Co. Litt. 326 n. After the death of the Earl of Thanet, in 1849, without issue, an Act was passed abolishing all hereditary claims and titles to the office, and empowering Her Majesty to appoint as in other counties. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 30.

West-Saxon-lage, the laws of the West Saxons.

Whale, a royal fish, the head being the King's property, and the tail the Queen's.—2 Step. Com. 465, 559.

Wharf, a broad plain place, near some creek or haven, to lay goods and wares on, that are brought to or from the water.

There are two kinds:—1st, legal, which are certain wharfs in all seaports, appointed by commission from the Court of Exchequer, or legalised by Act of Parliament; 2nd, sufferance, which are places where certain goods may be landed and shipped, by special sufferance granted by the Crown for that purpose.

Wharfage, money paid for landing goods at a wharf, or for shipping and taking goods into a boat or barge thence.

Wharfinger, he that owns or keeps a wharf.

pa Wheelage, duty or toll paid for carts, &c. ssing over certain ground.

Whereas, a word which implies a recital of a past fact. The word whereas, when it renders the deed senseless or repugnant, may be struck out as impertinent, and shall not vitiate a deed in other respects sensible. See Platt on Covts. 35.

Whig, sour milk. The name was applied in Scotland, A.D. 1648, to those violent covenanters who opposed the Duke of Hamilton's invasion of England in order to restore Charles the First.

The appellation of Whig and Tory to political factions was first heard of in A.D. 1679, and though as senseless as any cant terms that could be devised, they became instantly as familiar in use as they have since continued.—2 Hall. Const. Hist. c. xii., p. 442 n, and p. 439.

Whig and Tory differed mainly in this, that to a Tory the constitution, inasmuch as it was the constitution, was an ultimate point, beyond which he never looked, and from which he thought it altogether impossible to swerve; whereas a Whig deemed all forms of government subordinate to the public good, and, therefore, liable to change when they should cease to promote their object. Within those bounds, which he, as well as his antagonist, meant not to transgress, and rejecting all unnecessary innovation, the Whig had a natural tendency to political improvement; the Tory an aversion to it. The one loved to descant on liberty and the rights of mankind, the other, on the mischiefs of sedition and the rights of kings. Though both admitted a common principle—the maintenance of the constitution—yet, this made the privileges of the subject, that the Crown's prerogative, his peculiar care. Hence, it seemed likely, that through passion and circumstance, the Tory might aid in establishing despotism, or the Whig in subverting monarchy. The former was generally hostile to the liberty of the press and the freedom of inquiry, especially in religion; the latter, their friend. The principle of the one, in short, was amelioration, of the other, conservation.

The cardinal principle of toryism was, that the king ought to exercise all his lawful prerogatives without the interference, or unsolicited advice, even of parliament, much less of the people.

'And though,' remarks Hallam (3 Const. Hist. v. iii. c. 16, p. 201), 'I cannot reckon these old appellations by any means characteristic of our political factions in the nineteenth century, the names Whig and Tory are often well applied to individuals.'

Whipper-in, the name given to one who sends for the members of his party when a division is expected in either House of Parliament.

Whipping, a punishment inflicted for many of the smaller offences.

The punishment of whipping was inflicted at common law on persons of inferior condition, guilty of petty larceny and other smaller offences. But it seems that, in the earliest periods, by the usage of the Star Chamber, it was never inflicted on a gentleman.

By 1 Geo. IV. c. 57, judgment shall in no case be given that any female, convicted of any offence, shall be whipped either publicly or privately.

The Criminal Law Consolidation Acts, 1861, (24 and 25 Vict. cc. 96, 97, 98, 99, and 100) authorize the punishment of whipping to be inflicted upon males below the age of 16 who have been convicted of various offences therein specified. When the court passes a sentence of whipping it must specify the number of strokes and the instrument with which they are to be inflicted, and the whipping must be private, and only inflicted once. The 25 Vict. c. 18, enacts that where the punishment of whipping is awarded for any offence by order of one or more justice or justices, made in exercise of his or their power of summary conviction, the order awarding such punishment shall specify the number of strokes to be inflicted and the instrument to be used in the infliction of them, and, in the case of an offender whose age does not exceed 14 years, the number of strokes shall not exceed twelve, and the instrument used shall be a birch rod; and that no offender shall be whipped more than once for the same offence. It also enacts that in Scotland no offender above 16 years of age shall be whipped for theft or for crime committed against person or property (s. 2).

The 26 and 27 Vict. c. 44, an Act for the further security of Her Majesty's subjects from personal violence, after reciting that it is provided by 24 and 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 43, that whosoever shall, being armed with any offensive weapon or instrument, rob or assault with intent to rob any person, or shall together with one or more other person or persons rob or assault with intent to rob any person, or shall rob any person, and at the time of or immediately before or after such robbery shall wound, beat, strike, or use any other personal violence to any person; and by 24 and 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 21, that whosoever shall by any means attempt to choke, suffocate, or strangle, or by any means calculated to choke, suffocate, or strangle, attempt to render any person insensible; unconscious, or incapable of resistance with intent in any of such cases thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit, or with intent in any such cases to assist any other person in committing, any indictable offence, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than 3 years; or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding 2 years, with or without hard labor, and with or without solitary confinement; enacts that when any person is convicted of a crime under either of the said sections the court may, in addition to the punishment awarded by the said sections, direct that the offender, if a male, be once, twice, or thrice privately whipped. Provided: 1. That if the offender be under the age of 16 the number of strokes at each whipping shall not exceed 25, and the instrument used shall be a birch rod; 2. In the case of other offenders the number of strokes at each whipping shall not exceed 50; 3. That the court in its sentence shall specify the number of strokes to be inflicted and the instrument to be used. In no case is the whipping to take place after the expiration of six months from the sentence, and if the offender be sentenced to penal servitude, it is to be inflicted before he is removed to a convict prison with a view to his undergoing penal servitude.

Whitehart-silver, a mulct on certain lands in or near to the forest of Whitehart, paid into the Exchequer, imposed by Henry III. upon Thomas de la Linda, for killing a beautiful white hart which that king before had spared in hunting.—Cambd. Brit. 150.

White Friars, a place in London between the Temple and Blackfriars, which was formerly a sanctuary, and therefore privileged from arrest.

White meats, milk, butter, cheese, eggs, and any composition of them.

White rents [reditus albi, Lat.], payments received in silver or white money.

White spurs, a kind of esquires.

Whitsuntide, the feast of Pentecost, being the fiftieth day after Easter, and the first of the four cross quarter-days of the year.

It was styled Whit-Sunday, partly because of those vast diffusions of light and knowledge which were then shed upon the apostles in order to the enlightening of the world; but principally from the white garments which they that were baptised at this time put on. Though Mr. Hamon L'Estrange conjectures that it is derived from the French word huict, which signifies eight, and then Whit Sunday will be Huict-Sunday, i. e. the Eighth Sunday, viz. from Easter; and to make his opinion the more probable, he observes, that the octave of any feast is in the Latin called utas, which he derives from the French word huictas. In a Latin letter I have by me, of the famous Gerard Langbain, I find another account of the original of this word, which he says he met with accidentally in a Bodleian manuscript. He observes from thence, that it was a custom among our ancestors upon this day to give all the milk of their ewes and kine to the poor for the love of God, in order to qualify themselves to receive the gift of the Holy Ghost: which milk being then (as it is still in some counties) called white meat, &c. therefore this day, from that custom, took the name of Whit-Sunday.—See Wheat. Com. Pr. 237.

Whitsun farthings, pentecostals, which see.

Whittlewood Forest. As to disafforesting this forest, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 42.

Whole blood, being related by both the father's and mother's side; derived from the same couple of ancestors.

Wic, a place on the sea-shore on the bank of a river.

Wica, a country house or farm.

Wichencrif, witchcraft.

Widow [fr. widwa, Sax.; weduwe, Dut.; weddw, Wel.; vidua, Lat.], a woman whose husband is dead.

Widow-bench, the share of her husband's estate, which a widow is allowed besides her jointure.

Widower, one whose wife is dead.

Widow-hunter, one who courts widows for a jointure.

Wild's Case, Rule in. A devise to B. and his children or issue, B. having no issue at the time of the devise, gives him an estate-tail; but if he have issue at the time, B. and his children take joint estates for life.—6 Co. 16 b; Tud. L. C. 542.

This case does not apply to personalty. See Audsley v. Horn, 7 W. R. 125, affirmed on, app. 8, W. R. 150; 2 Wms. Exs. 984; 2 Jarm. Wills. 327.

Will, 'the legal declaration of a man's intentions, which he wills to be performed after his death' (see 2 Bl. Com. 499). It is said by Lord Coke that 'in law most commonly ultima voluntas in scriptis is used when lands or tenements are devised, and testamentum when it concerneth chattels' (Co. Litt. 111 a). Swinburne defines a last will and testament to be 'the just sentence of our will touching what we would have done after our death.' The law with respect to wills is now regulated by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, commonly called the Wills Act.

The first section enacts, that the word 'will' shall extend to a testament, and to a codicil, and to an appointment by will or by writing in the nature of a will in exercise of a power, and to a disposition by will and testament or devise of the custody and tuition of any child, by virtue of the 12 Car. II. c. 24, or of 14 & 15 Car. II. (Ireland), and to any other testamentary disposition, and also defines the meaning of the words 'real estate' and 'personal estate' as used in the Act.

The second section repeals the following Acts relating to wills:—32 Hen. VIII. c. 1; 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 5; 10 Car. I. sess. 2, c. 2; ss. 5, 6, 12, 19, 20, 21, and 22 of the 29 Car. II. c. 3, commonly called the Statute of Frauds, and of the 7 Wm. III. c. 12 (the Irish Statute of Frauds); s. 14 of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, and of 6 Anne, c. 10 (Ireland); s. 9 of 14 Geo. II. c. 20; 25 Geo. II. c. 6 (except as to the colonies); 25 Geo. II. c. 11, and 55 Geo. III. c. 192. These Acts are repealed, except so far as they relate to any wills or estates pur autre vie to which this Act does not extend. The statutes on this subject which remain in force are the 12 Car. II. c. 24, ss. 8, 9, 10, relative to the appointment of testamentary guardians by parents; the Statute of Charitable Uses and Fraudulent Devises, and the Registry Acts, relating to those matters that are not within the scope of this Act, and the 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 20, as to the execution and attestation of wills and letters of attorney of seamen, marines, and petty officers of the navy, and non-commissioned officers of marines.

The third section, termed the 'general enabling clause,' enacts that it shall be lawful for every person to devise, bequeath, or dispose of real estate, and all personal estate which he shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, at the time of his death, and the power given shall extend to all real estate of the nature of customary freehold or tenant-right, or customary or copyhold, notwithstanding that the testator may not have surrendered the same to the use of his will, or that being entitled as heir, devisee, or otherwise, to be admitted thereto, he shall not have been admitted, or that the same, in consequence of the want of a custom to devise or surrender to the use of a will or otherwise, could not at law have been disposed of by will, or that the same in consequence of there being a custom that a will, or a surrender to the use of a will, should continue in force for a limited time only, or any other special custom, could not have been disposed of by will according to the powers contained in this Act, if this Act had not been made; also all estates pur autre vie, all contingent interests, and all rights of entry and property acquired even subsequently to the execution of his will.

The fourth section provides for the payment of the stamp-duties, fines and fees, which would have been paid or payable in respect of the surrender, where there was a custom to surrender to the use of the will; and further provides, inasmuch as a devise before admittance is authorized by the Act, that the devisee shall not be admitted until he has paid the dues which his testator would have been liable to pay on admittance, as well as the dues on his own admittance.

The fifth section enacts, that when any real estate of the nature of customary freehold or tenant-right, or customary or copyhold, shall be disposed of by will, so much of the will as shall contain such disposition shall be entered on the court-rolls of the manor or reputed manor of which it is holden; but as to any declaration of trust contained in such will it shall be sufficient to state in the entry on the court rolls, that such real estate is subject to the trusts declared by such will; and the lord shall be entitled to the same fine, heriot, dues, duties and services from the devisee as would have been due from the customary heir, in case of the descent of the same real estate, and shall have the same remedy for enforcing such fine, &c. as he would have against the customary heir in case of a descent.

The sixth section enacts, that if no disposition by will be made of any estate pur autre vie of a freehold nature, the same shall be chargeable in the hands of the heir, if it come to him by reason of special occupancy, as assets by descent, as in the case of freehold land in fee-simple; and in the case of there being no special occupant of any estate pur autre vie, whether freehold or customary freehold, tenant-right, customary or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, it shall go to the executor or administrator of the party that had the estate thereof by virtue of the grant, and if it come to the executor or administrator either by reason of a special occupancy, or by virtue of this Act, it shall be assets in his hands, and shall be applied and distributed in the same manner as the personal estate of the testator or intestate. See SPECIAL OCCUPANCY.

These sections enact what property is disposable by will, but inasmuch as the old law is applicable where the will was made before January 1st, 1838, and has not since been republished or revived by any codicil executed as required by the Wills Act, it is necessary to state wherein the new law differs from the old.

Personal chattels, then, of every kind, and leaseholds for years, were always disposable by will. The same may be said generally of freeholds, customary freeholds, and copyholds; with the exception (now repealed) of the legal estate in such customary freeholds as were not directly devisable. Customary estates and copyholds were not under the old law devisable, without surrender to the use of the will, or without admittance of the devisor, except when the estate was equitable, or came to the devisor by descent, but under the new law they may be devised (The rights of the lord are preserved by the fourth section, and the fifth provides for the registration of wills affecting copyholds; under the old law a mere recital on the admittance was all that was necessary). Rights of action and of entry which could not have been devised under the old law are now devisable. Contingent estates and possibilities of every kind are now devisable; they were not devisable under the old law, with the exception of estates contingent as to the person, e. g. a joint-tenant's chance of survivorship, and an expectant heir's chance of inheritance. Estates pur autre vie of every kind, except estates quasi in tail are now devisable, but under the old law no such estates were devisable unless by special custom, except estates pur autre vie in copyholds not specially limited.

Formerly no real estate which the testator had not at the date of the will would pass by it without republication, although personal property would, if the words of the will were sufficiently comprehensive. But now the power of disposing by will is extended to all such real as well as personal estate as the testator may be entitled to at the time of his death (see sect. 24).

An estate-tail, or an estate quasi in tail, i. e. an estate limited to a person, and the heirs of his body, so long as another person or persons named shall live, cannot be devised.

As to the persons who may make wills, the seventh section enacts, that no will made by any person under the age of twenty-one years shall be valid. Under the old law, an infant of the age of fourteen years, if a male, or of twelve years, if a female, could make a valid will of personalty, although not of realty. Infants could also by will execute powers simply collateral, i. e. not coupled with an interest, and appoint guardians of their children.

At common law, idiots, lunatics (except during lucid intervals), persons imbecile from disease, old age, or drunkenness, are incapable of making a will. One who is born deaf and dumb is presumed by the law to be an idiot; but such presumption may be rebutted; and if it can be proved that he understands the nature of the act, and desires to make a will, he may declare his will by signs and tokens. In the case of a blind testator, it is necessary to prove his knowledge and approval of the contents of the will he has executed. Wills made under mistake, or obtained by fraud, or by undue influence, are inoperative. See MISTAKE, FRAUD, UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Traitors and felons are incapable of making testaments from the time of their conviction, except as to trust property. A felo de se cannot make a will of personalty, although he may devise lands. Outlaws are incapable of making wills of personalty so long as the outlawry continues; but he who is outlawed in a personal action may devise his lands. An alien friend may make a will of personalty, but not of realty. An alien enemy, unless he has obtained the King's license to reside in this country, is incapable of making any will. See EXECUTION OF WILLS, and PUBLICATION.

By section eight no will made by any married woman shall be valid, except such a will as might have been made by a married woman before the passing of this Act.

A married woman, as a general rule, is incapable of devising lands and of making a testament of personalty without her husband's consent. The husband may, however, by waiving his right to be his wife's administrator, empower her to make a will of personalty, but he may revoke his assent at any time before probate, and it is therefore necessary to prove his assent when probate is prayed. His assent only gives validity to the wife's will if he survives her.

To this general rule there are some exceptions. A married woman may, by special custom, devise her copyholds. She may also make a will in pursuance of an ante-nuptial agreement, or of a post-nuptial agreement for consideration, or by virtue of a power; and she may dispose of personalty actually given and settled, or agreed to be given and settled to her separate use, whether it be in possession or in reversion, and this rule extends to savings out of her personal property. In these cases probate can be obtained without the husband's assent, limited to the property of which the testatrix had power to dispose.

A wife who has obtained a protection order for her property, on the ground of her husband's desertion, or who has been judicially separated from her husband, may dispose of her property in all respects as if she were a feme sole (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 21 & 25).

A married woman, who is an executrix, may make a will for the mere purpose of devolving her representative character on another, even without her husband's assent. The Act will probably not be held to dispense with the surrender to the use of the will of a married woman, as to lands which she may devise by special custom, inasmuch as a surrender implied an examination of the married woman by the steward, touching her free will and intention. If the husband have abjured the realm, or been banished, the wife's disability ceases both as to real and personal estate.

The fourteenth section enacts, that if any person, who shall attest the execution of a will, shall, at the time of the execution, or at any time afterwards, be incompetent to be admitted a witness to prove the execution thereof, such will shall not on that account be invalid.

The fifteenth section enacts, that if any person shall attest the execution of any will, to whom or to whose wife or husband any beneficial devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment, of or affecting any real or personal estate (other than and except charges and directions for the payment of any debt or debts) shall be thereby given or made, such devise, &c., shall, so far only as concerns such person attesting the execution of such will, or the wife or husband of such person, or any person claiming under such person or wife or husband, be utterly null and void, and such person, so attesting, shall be admitted as a witness to prove the execution of such will, or to prove the validity or invalidity thereof, notwithstanding such devise, &c.

The sixteenth section enacts, that in case by any will any real or personal estate shall be charged with any debt or debts, and any creditor, or the wife or husband of any creditor whose debt is so charged, shall attest the execution of such will, such creditor shall be admitted a witness to prove the execution of such will, or to prove the validity or invalidity thereof.

The seventeenth section enacts, that no person shall, on account of his being an executor of a will, be incompetent to be admitted a witness to prove the execution of such will, or a witness to prove the validity or invalidity thereof.

The ninth section directs the mode in which wills are to be executed. It enacts, 'that no will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say) it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, and such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator; but no form of attestation shall be necessary.' Some doubts having arisen as to the meaning of the words 'foot or end thereof' in this sec. the 15 Vict. c. 24, was passed which enacts, 'that every will shall, so far only as regards the position of the signature of the testator or of the person signing for him as aforesaid, be deemed to be valid within the said enactment as explained by this Act, if the signature shall be so placed at or after or following, or under, or beside, or opposite to the end of the will, that it shall be apparent on the face of the will that the testator intended to give effect by such his signature to the writing signed as his will, and that no such will shall be affected by the circumstance that the signature shall not follow or be immediately after the foot or end of the will, or by the circumstance that a blank space shall intervene between the concluding word of the will and the signature, or by the circumstance that the signature shall be placed among the words of the testimonium clause, or of the clause of attestation, or shall follow or be after or under the clause of attestation, either with or without a blank space intervening, or shall follow or be after or under or beside the names or one of the names of the subscribing witnesses, or by the circumstance that the signature shall be on a side or page or other portion of the paper or papers containing the will whereon no clause or paragraph or disposing part of the will shall be written above the signature, or by the circumstance that there shall appear to be sufficient space on or at the bottom of the preceding side or page or other portion of the same paper on which the will is written to contain the signature; and the enumeration of the above circumstances shall not restrict the generality of the above enactment, but no signature under the said Act or this Act shall be operative to give effect to any disposition or direction which is underneath or which follows it, nor shall it give effect to any disposition or direction inserted after the signature shall be made.'

The eleventh section excepts from the rule that all wills must be in writing, wills of personal estate made by soldiers in actual military service, or seamen at sea. This exception includes military and naval officers of all ranks.

Nuncupative wills were formerly valid; but the statute of frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3) laid them under many restrictions (except when made by soldiers and sailors), of which Blackstone gives the following summary: 'The statute enacts: (1) That no written will shall be revoked or altered by a subsequent nuncupative one, except the same be in the lifetime of the testator reduced to writing and read over to him, and approved, and unless the same be proved to have been so done by the oaths of three witnesses at the least, who by statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, must be such as are admissible upon trials at common law. (2) That no nuncupative will shall in any wise be good where the estate bequeathed exceeds 30*l*., unless proved by three such witnesses present at the making thereof (the Roman law requiring seven), and unless they or some of them were specially required to bear witness thereto by the testator himself, and unless it was made in his last sickness, in his own habitation or dwelling-house, or where he had been previously resident ten days at the least, except he be surprised with sickness on a journey, or from home, and dies without returning to his dwelling. (3) That no nuncupative will shall be proved till fourteen days after the death of the testator, nor till process hath first issued to call in the widow or next of kin to contest it, if they think proper. Thus hath the legislature provided against any frauds in setting up nuncupative wills, by so numerous a train of requisites, that the thing itself has fallen into disuse, and is hardly ever heard of, but in the only instance where favor ought to be shown to it, when the testator is surprised by sudden and violent sickness' (2 Black. Com. 500.)

Before the passing of the Wills Act no solemnities of any kind were necessary to make a valid will of personal estate. The signature and attestation required by the Statute of Frauds to render valid a devise of lands were not essential to the validity of wills of personalty. We have already mentioned the restrictions placed upon the making of nuncupative wills. It was not necessary that a will in writing should be either signed or sealed by the testator, whether it was in his own handwriting or in that of another man. As to wills of realty, it was enacted by 29 Car. II. c. 3 (Statute of Frauds), that all devises of lands and tenements should not only be in writing, but should also be signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence and by his express direction, and should be witnessed and subscribed in the presence of the person devising by three or more credible witnesses, or else the devise should be entirely void, and the land should descend to the heir-at-law.

With regard to the revocation of wills, it is enacted by the eighteenth section 'that every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage, except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when the real or personal estate thereby appointed would not, in default of such appointment, pass to his or her heir, customary heir, executor, or administrator, or the person entitled as his or her next of kin under the Statute of Distributions;' by the nineteenth section, 'that no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances;' by the twentieth section, 'that no will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same;' and by the twenty-third section, 'that no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as aforesaid, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in such real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death.'

Under the old law wills might be revoked either expressly or by implication. An implied revocation might be effected by a change of circumstances, such as the marriage of the testator and the birth of a child capable of benefiting by the revocation, or by alterations of or attempted dealings with the property; but the presumption of revocation which arose from such change of circumstances was capable of being rebutted by evidence of an intention to adhere to the will. Wills were also revoked by destruction, cancellation, &c. with intention to revoke.

The twenty-first section relates to obliterа-tions, interlineations, and other alterations in wills, and enacts, 'that no obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration made in any will after the execution thereof shall be valid or have any effect except so far as the words or effect of the will before such alteration shall not be apparent, unless such alteration shall be executed in like manner as hereinbefore is required for the execution of the will, but the will with such alteration as part thereof shall be deemed to be duly executed if the signature of the testator and the subscription of the witnesses be made in the margin or on some other part of the will opposite or near to such alteration, or at the foot or end of or opposite to a memorandum referring to such alteration, and written at the end or some other part of the will.'

The thirteenth section enacts, 'that every will executed in manner hereinbefore required shall be valid without any other publication thereof.'

With regard to the revival of a revoked will, the twenty-second section enacts, 'that no will, or codicil, or any part thereof, which shall be in any manner revoked shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same; and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked, and afterwards wholly revoked, shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shown.'

As to the time from which a will speaks, the twenty-fourth section enacts, 'that every will shall be construed, with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.'

Formerly a will spoke and took effect as to personal property from the date of the death of the testator, except where specific legacies were given, and as to freehold property from the date of the will.

No alteration is made by the twenty-fourth section in the old rules of construction with regard to the persons to whom property is given by will; those rules are that legacies and bequests to persons named or described in the will speak and take effect as to such persons from the date of the execution, but legacies and bequests to classes of persons speak and take effect as to such classes from the date of the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention appear.

As a general rule, gifts to persons fail by their death in the testator's lifetime, notwithstanding a declaration that they shall not lapse, but to this rule there are the following exceptions:—In the case of gifts in joint-tenancy to several, of whom one at least survives the testator; in the case of a gift to a person in tail, or quasi in tail, who leaves issue who would be inheritable under such entail surviving the testator; and also in the case of a gift of an absolute or transmissible interest to a child or other issue of the testator, who leaves issue surviving the testator. The question then occurs, for whose benefit do such gifts lapse? A share in the residue lapses according to the nature of the property for the benefit of the real or personal representatives of the testator. A specific gift lapses for the benefit of the residuary devisee or legatee (ss. 25, 32 & 33). Under the old law, a specific gift of freehold or copyhold estate lapsed for the benefit of the heir, but a mere charge on the land lapsed for the benefit of the residuary or specific devisee of that land; a specific gift of personalty lapsed for the benefit of the residuary legatee. See LAPSED DEVISE and LAPSED LEGACY.

As to the construction of a general devise of lands, the twenty-sixth section enacts, 'that a devise of the land of the testator, or of the land of the testator in any place, or in the occupation of any person mentioned in his will, or otherwise described in a general manner, and any other general devise which would describe a customary, copyhold, or leasehold estate if the testator had no freehold estate which could be described by it, shall be construed to include the customary copyhold and leasehold estates of the testator, or his customary copyhold and leasehold estates, or any of them, to which such description shall extend, as the case may be, as well as freehold estates, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.' Under the old law such a devise was construed to include freeholds and copyholds; if there were no copyholds or freeholds to satisfy the devise, it then extended to leaseholds.

As to the expressions necessary to execute a general power, the twenty-seventh section enacts, that a devise or bequest in general terms, of real or personal property, shall be construed to include any property coming within the description, which the testator may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, unless a contrary intention shall appear. Under the old law it was necessary that such a devise or bequest should refer either to the power or to the specific property which was the subject of it, in order that it might have that effect.

As to the devise of a fee, the twenty-eighth section enacts, 'that where any real estate shall be devised to any person without any words of limitation, such devise shall be construed to pass the fee-simple, or other the whole estate or interest which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.' Under the old law only a life estate passed, unless words were used to show an intention to pass the fee.

A general bequest of personalty, including leaseholds, without words of limitation, passed the whole interest before the Wills Act, which has made no alteration in this rule.

The twenty-ninth section enacts, 'that in any devise or bequest of real or personal estate, the words "die without issue," or "die without leaving issue," or "have no issue," or any other words which may import either a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, by reason of such person having a prior estate-tail, or of a preceding gift, being, without any implication arising from such words, a limitation of an estate-tail to such person, or issue, or otherwise; provided, that this Act shall not extend to cases where such words as aforesaid import if no issue described in a preceding gift shall be born, or if there shall be no issue who shall live to attain the age, or otherwise answer the description required for obtaining a vested estate, by a preceding gift to such issue.' The construction of this section is that such words mean a failure of issue at the death of the ancestor named, unless a contrary intention appear; whereas, under the old law, they meant an indefinite failure of issue, unless expressions or circumstances indicated a contrary intention.

As to the estate of trustees under a general devise the thirtieth section enacts, that 'where any real estate (other than or not being a presentation to a church) shall be devised to any trustee or executor, such devise shall be construed to pass the fee-simple or other the whole estate or interest which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, unless a definite term of years, absolute or determinable, or an estate of freehold, shall thereby be given to him expressly or by implication.'

The thirty-first section enacts, that 'where any real estate shall be devised to a trustee, without any express limitation of the estate to be taken by such trustee, and the beneficial interest in such real estate, or in the surplus rents and profits thereof, shall not be given to any person for life, or such beneficial interest shall be given to any person for life, but the purposes of the trust may continue beyond the life of such person, such devise shall be construed to vest in such trustee the fee-simple, or other the whole legal estate which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, and not an estate determinable when the purposes of the trust shall be satisfied.'

It will have been remarked how very nearly the conditions or postulates necessary to bring these two clauses into operation are identical. They differ but in these four respects. The first clause embraces all real estates, except presentations, the second contains no such exception. The first extends to devises to executors, the second does not, though this is a nominal difference. The first permits implied limitations to prevent its operation, the second does not. The second does not apply where the beneficial interest is given to a person for life, and the trustee has no duty which may extend beyond the life of that person; the first does apply to such a case, being irrespective of all trusts, except such as may raise an implication of estate against it. But what do they effect when in action? They give the fee to the trustee, while, under the old state of things, such an estate passed as was commensurate with the trusts.

As to what wills and estates pur autre vie are within this Act, the thirty-fourth section enacts, 'that this Act shall not extend to any will made before 1st January, 1838, and that every will re-executed or republished, or revived by any codicil, shall for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to have been made at the time at which the same shall be so re-executed, republished, or revived; and that this Act shall not extend to any estate pur autre vie of any person who shall die before 1st January, 1838.'

The thirty-fifth section enacts, that this Act shall not extend to Scotland. See 15 Vict. c. 24.

Will, Estate at. This estate entitles the grantee or lessee to the possession of land during the pleasure of both the grantor and himself, yet it creates no sure or durable right, and is bounded by no definite limits as to duration. It must be at the reciprocal will of both parties (for if it be at the will of the lessor only, it is a lease for life), and the dissent of either determines it. The grantee cannot transfer the estate to another, although after he has entered into possession he may accept a release of the inheritance from the grantor, for there exists a privity between them. It must end at the death of either party, for death deprives a person of the power of having any will. If a lessee for years accept an estate at will in the property leased, his term of years would in law be surrendered.

An estate at will is created either by the stipulation or express agreement of the parties, or by construction of law.

For the furtherance of justice, and in order to encourage agriculture by securing to the farmer the just right of reaping that which he has sown, the courts of law will construe an estate at will created by parol into a tenancy for a year, or from year to year, provided such a construction would not work a forfeiture or be not productive of any wrong or injury, and there be no Act of Parliament which declares such estate shall be an estate at will.

Mr. Preston says (Est. p. 668, 1st edit.), 'The judges have been thought to express themselves of late years as if there might not be a tenancy at will. However, they are not to be understood as advancing any such indefinite position. All they mean to say, and all that can be inferred from what they have said when their expressions are referred to the subject matter, is that there shall not be a tenancy at will by construction, or, in other words, they declare the law to be that as often as there is a demise without any limitation of time it shall be construed a demise for one year, and afterwards from year to year at the election of the parties; and as to these tenancies by construction, it is clear that unless a notice to quit shall be given at the end of the first half-year, the tenant may hold for a second year, and so on from year to year until a notice to quit is given to him for half a year before the end of the current year: and the judges are not to be understood to say that there may not at this day be a demise at will.'

The Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 1) enacts that a lease by parol for a longer term than three years, shall have the force and effect of an estate at will only. The courts have decided that such an estate at will shall be a tenancy from year to year. The grounds of this determination appear to be that the object of the statute was principally to render invalid any parol agreement for a lease for a longer term than three years; and as the constructive tenancy from year to year, arising from the mere possession at an annual rent, was not then established, the statute could only refer to a tenancy at will when it avoided the actual agreement between the parties: but after the tenancy from year to year was raised by implication of law by the acts of the parties, the courts did not feel that they violated the intention of the statute by giving the same effect to the possession and payment of rent by a person who entered under a parol lease void by the statute, which they would have done had the same circumstances occurred unconnected with such parol lease, and they therefore felt themselves bound by the prior decisions to put the same construction upon those circumstances as evidence to infer an agreement for a tenancy from year to year, notwithstanding the agreement between the parties, which in consequence of the statute could not be taken into consideration. They do not, therefore, give any effect to a parol lease which the statute has rendered null, but merely presume, consistently with their decisions in other cases, an agreement for a different kind of tenancy where the facts of the case will warrant that construction. And it should seem that in conformity with these principles, they would construe a possession taken under a parol lease void by the statute as a strict tenancy at will where no act is done by the lessor by acceptance of rent or otherwise, to raise by implication a tenancy from year to year, but where such acts take place that tenancy will be implied.

Notwithstanding this construction of the courts, estates at will still exist and arise in the following cases:—

(1) Where there is an express letting by will.

(2) Where the raising a tenancy from year to year by implication alone would make a forfeiture: for a mere construction of law cannot be allowed where it will work an injury.

(3) A mortgagor in possession of the mortgaged property, without any express agreement as to the period of possession, and with the mortgagee's consent, is but a tenant-at-will to the mortgagee, but he is not entitled to emblements, for they go in discharge of the loan, and he may be ejected by the mortgagee without any previous determination of the will.

(4) A beneficiary or cestui que trust in possession of the estate, with the consent or acquiescence of the trustee, is constructively a tenant-at-will to his trustee, in order to preserve as well the interest of the cestui que trust as the estate of the trustee.

(5) An entry upon property by a person under an agreement to purchase or take a lease of it, with the consent of the vendor or lessor raises a tenancy-at-will between the parties until the agreement be carried into execution and completed.

(6) If a person make a feoffment and deliver the deed without giving livery of seisin, and the feoffee enter, he is constructively a tenant-at-will.

A tenant-at-will is entitled to emblements where his estate is determined by the lessor or by his death, and his personal representatives are entitled to it where the estate is determined by his own death; but if the lessee forfeit or determine the estate himself he is not then entitled to them. It is to be remarked that a tenant from year to year has not the same advantage if his tenancy expire before the harvest, as he must yield up possession at the regular expiration of the notice to quit without any reference to the then state of the crops. He is not bound to maintain or repair the premises, but is liable for wilful waste.

We have seen that either party may determine this estate. The lessor can do so by an express declaration that the lessee shall hold no longer, which should either be made on the land or notice of it served upon the lessee. But if he exercise any right of ownership, unless it be with the lessee's consent, inconsistent with the enjoyment of the estate, as entering upon the land, cutting down trees demised, making a transfer or lease for years to commence immediately the estate will be determined. So also if the lessee commit an act of desertion or do anything inconsistent with his estate, as assigning it to another person or committing waste; but a verbal declaration that he will hold the lands no longer does not determine his estate unless he waive at the same time the possession. Neither party can determine this estate at a time when it would be beneficial to the other, and six months' notice must be given before bringing an action of ejectment.

If a tenant-at-will rendering rent quarterly determine his will in the middle of a quarter he must pay a quarter's rent.

If the lessor determine this estate, the lessee shall have reasonable ingress and egress to take away his goods and chattels. This is simply common justice. See Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 175.

Wound, any lesion of the body, whether a cut, bruise, contusion, fracture, dislocation, or burn. In surgery it is confined to a solution of continuity in any part of the body suddenly caused by anything that cuts or tears with a division of the skin.

The judicial questions which arise in cases of wounding (which is an aggravated species of battery) where death ensues are:—How far has the person who caused the injury contributed to the death of the deceased, or to the lesion of one or other of the functions of the body? And to what is a certain wound to be referred?

Circumstances as well as accident have a considerable effect on wounds:—

(1) The constitution and age of the patient, and his antecedent as well as co-existent maladies may exercise a baneful influence on the injury received.

(2) The passions of the patient, and his negligence or delay, or that of his attendants, may render slight wounds dangerous, or dangerous wounds mortal.

(3) Insalubrity of the atmosphere.

(4) The ignorance or negligence of the surgeon may aggravate or endanger the condition of a wounded patient.—Beck's Med. Jur. c. xv. See MAYHEM.

This revenue of wrecks is frequently granted to lords of manors as a royal franchise. It is a branch of the coroner's office to inquire concerning shipwrecks and certify whether wreck or not, and who is in possession of the goods.

The offence of plundering or stealing any part of vessels wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, or any goods, &c. belonging to such vessel, is a felony (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 64). Persons in possession of shipwrecked goods, who cannot satisfy a justice that they came by them lawfully, are liable to be imprisoned or to forfeit a sum not exceeding 20*l.* beyond the value of such goods (s. 65). A similar punishment is attached to the offence of offering or exposing shipwrecked goods for sale which have been unlawfully taken, or shall reasonably be suspected so to have been taken from a wreck, if the person offering or exposing them for sale do not satisfy a justice that he came by them lawfully (s. 66). The offence of unlawfully and maliciously destroying any part of a wreck, or any goods, &c. belonging to it, is a felony (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 49).

The year is either astronomical, ecclesiastical, or regnal, beginning on the 1st of January, or 25th of March; or the day of the Queen's accession.—Dug. Chron. Jur. Pref. 2. See CALENDAR.

The division of the year into term and vacation has been the joint work of the church and necessity. The cultivation of the earth, and the collection of its fruits, necessarily require a time of leisure from all attendance on civil affairs; and the laws of the Church had, at various times, assigned certain seasons of the year to an observance of religious peace, during which time all legal strife was strictly interdicted. What remained of the year not disposed of in this manner, was allowed for the administration of justice. The Anglo-Saxons had been governed by these two reasons, in distinguishing the periods of vacation and term; the latter they called dies pacis regis; the former dies pacis Dei et sanctæ ecclesiæ. The particular portions of time which the Saxons had allowed to these two seasons were adhered to by the Normans, together with other Saxon usages.—1 Reeves, c. iv., p. 191.

The year-books are rather curious from their antiquity than valuable for their contents, which are undigested and loosely revised.—Hale's Hist. p. 198; 2 Reeves, 357; 4 Ibid. 414.

(unless the lord of the fee agreed for the redemption of such waste), afterwards restoring them to the lord of the fee.—Staund. Prærog. 44.

This prerogative was abolished by the 54 Geo. III. c. 145. See ESCHEAT.

Year to year, Tenancy from.

This estate arises either expressly, as when land is let from year to year, or by a general parol demise, without any determinate interest, but reserving the payment of an annual rent; or impliedly, as when property is occupied generally under a rent payable yearly, half-yearly, or quarterly; or, when an occupier, under an agreement for lease at a certain rent, pays rent; or when a tenant holds over, after the expiration of his term, without having entered into any new contract, and paid rent (for before paying rent only a tenancy on sufferance arises).

A demise by a tenant from year to year to another, also to hold from year to year, is in legal operation a demise from year to year during the continuance of the original demise to the intermediate landlord. When a tenant goes into possession of property under a void lease, a tenancy from year to year is created. If a mortgagee accept a person as his tenant, to whom the mortgagor has granted a lease for years after the mortgage, that makes him only tenant from year to year to the mortgagee.

This tenancy consists, in the first instance, of a certain term from one year, which, upon the expiration of the first half-year, unless notice be given by one of the parties to the other of his contrary intention, becomes an equally assured term of two years, reckoning from the commencement of the tenancy; and thus a new year is continually added to the term, as often as the half-year's previous notice which would secure its expiration is omitted to be given. In short, a tenancy from year to year is considered as re-commencing every year.

The distinction taken between a tenant from year to year, and a tenant for a term of years, is rather a distinction in words than in substance, for they both possess the same advantages, the estates partaking of nearly the same attributes.

The qualities that distinguish it from proper terms for years, and from estates at will, are that it may now be raised by construction of law alone, instead of an estate at will in every instance where a possession is taken with the consent of the legal owner, and where an annual rent has been paid, but without there having been any conveyance or agreement conferring a legal interest; and that, whether it arises from express agreement, or by implication of law, it may, unless surrendered or determined by a regular notice to quit, subsist for an indefinite period, if the estate of the lessor will allow of it, or for the whole term of his estate, where it is of a limited duration, unaffected by the death either of the lessor or lessee, or by a conveyance of their estate by either of them; and the assigns, or real or personal representatives, of the former, according to the quantity of his estate, and the assignee, or personal representatives, of the latter, still continue the tenancy upon the original terms, and subject to the same conditions which the law, or the express agreement of the parties, has attached to it. But it is liable at any time to be determined by a notice to quit, from either party, which, where there is no agreement, or where the agreement is silent on that point, must be at least half a year's (and not merely six months') notice, requiring from the tenant, or offering on his part, to give up possession at the expiration of the year, computing from the time when the tenancy commenced. And a parol notice is sufficient, unless the agreement requires it to be in writing (per Lord Ellenborough, C.-J. in Doe v. Crick, 5 Esp. N. P. C. 197); but for the sake of evidence it is always advisable to give a written notice. And where the commencement of the tenancy is not known, and the lessor cannot, from the objection of the tenant to the notice, or any other cause, avail himself of the periods of the payment of the rent as presumptive evidence of the commencement of it, a notice from him requiring the tenant to quit, at the expiration of the current year of the tenancy, which shall expire next after the end of half a year from the date of the notice, will be sufficient. But it seems advisable in such a case to give the notice on one of the quarter days on which the rent is payable, and not to bring an ejectment before the expiration of a year and a quarter from the date of the notice, in order to be certain that the year of tenancy has expired.

The incidents of this estate are these: —

(1) The owner may assign or underlet the property unless expressly restricted.

(2) He is entitled to emblements when his estate ends by the happening of an uncertain event over which he has no control.

(3) He is liable for injuries arising from voluntary negligence.

(4) He is bound to fair and tenantable, but not to substantial and lasting, repairs.

 The Supplement may be had separately, price 3s. boards.

'It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom therefore the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editors have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it.'

Phillips's Law of Copyright.

The Law of Copyright in Works of Literature and Art, and in the Application of Designs. With the Statutes relating thereto. By CHARLES PALMER PHILLIPS, of Lincoln's Inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Just Published. In 8vo, price 12*s.* cloth.

"Mr. Phillips's work is at once an able law-book, and a lucid treatise, in a popular form, on the rights of authors and artists. The wants and interests of the legal practitioners are consulted by a careful collection and discussion of all the authorities, while the non-professional reader will find in the book a well-written and perfectly intelligible statement of the law upon the matter of which it treats."—Jurist, January 9th, 1864.

"Mr. Phillips has shewn, not only great diligence in collecting cases bearing upon the various topics which he has treated, but considerable judgment in the manner in which he has dealt with them. He has spared no pains to make his work reliable as a legal text-book, and at the same time equally useful to publishers, authors, artists, and other persons who are interested in works of literature, art, or design. In a word, such a book has long been wanted, and Mr. Phillips has given abundant proof of his ability to meet the desideratum."—Solicitors' Journal, Nov. 14, 1863.

"Mr. Phillips has fully and clearly stated the law, and he has cited the cases decided upon it with sufficient amplitude to make them perfectly intelligible, without the necessity for reference to the Reports. . . . . It will be valuable not to the lawyer alone, but to the author and publisher, who will find it a trustworthy, intelligent, and intelligible adviser on the many questions that are continually arising in their vocations."—Law Times, Dec. 12, 1863.

OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER-AT-LAW;

PROFESSOR OF THE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF COMMERCE IN KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON; DOCTOR OF POLITICAL ECONOMY, TUBINGEN;

ETC., ETC., ETC.

SECOND EDITION.

"MR. LEVI'S scheme in this very valuable work, to which he has devoted a laborious life, is original, but it commends itself at once to the judgment as the right method for the treatment of so large a theme. The fundamental principles of commercial law are the same everywhere and at all times. As they were recognised by the civil law, so they are the foundation of our own law and of the commercial codes of all civilised peoples.

"Having described these universally acknowledged principles of the law merchant, Mr. Levi proceeds to examine the rules that have been superadded to them in different countries, and to bring them in their turn into mutual contact, and thus to indicate precisely, not only where they differ from the general principle, but also in what particulars they differ from one another, and this with the double purpose of informing the reader what the actual law is in each country, as also in what manner that law is capable of improvement. Looking at the enormous extent of our commerce, which embraces every country on the face of the earth, the great importance to the merchant, and to the lawyer whom he consults for advice and aid in difficulty, of a knowledge of the commercial law of those countries will be recognised at a glance. Mr. Levi's plan is to devote a distinct chapter to each of the most important branches of mercantile law, and to give in succession the law of the various states in relation to it, pointing out the divergencies of each from our own law and from the law of other states. In this manner he treats of Partnership, Joint-stock Companies, Principal and Agent, Hiring and Service, Contracts, Bills of Exchange, Cheques, Banking, Bank-notes, Guarantees, Negotiable Instruments, Patents, Copyright, Trade-marks, Shipping, Affreightment, Carriers, Marine Insurance, General Average, Fire and Life Assurance, Bankruptcy, Remedy for Recovery of Debts, Arbitration, and Courts for Administration of Commercial Law. Such a range of practical subjects must recommend this work, in its improved form in this second edition, to every lawyer whose business lies among a community carrying on foreign trade of any kind. It is the only English book dealing with the subject so fully, so carefully, and so practically.—Law Times, Jan. 23, 1884.

PRIDEAUX'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING; WITH Dissertations ON ITS LAW AND PRACTICE.

FOURTH EDITION

BY

FREDERICK PRIDEAUX,

AND

JOHN WHITCOMBE,

BOTH OF LINCOLN'S INN, ESQRS., BARRISTERS-AT-LAW.

PREFACE TO THE FOURTH EDITION.

Six years have elapsed since the publication of the Third Edition of this Work. Several Statutes affecting the law and practice of Conveyancing have been passed in the interval, and are discussed in the Dissertations of the present Edition. These Dissertations have been considerably amplified, and upwards of eight hundred and fifty additional cases are cited.

The number of Precedents also has been greatly increased, and care has been taken to render all of them (now amounting to three hundred and eighty-eight) as simple, comprehensive, and practically useful as possible.

Morgan's Chancery Acts and Orders.—Third Edition, 1862.

The Statutes, General Orders, and Regulations relating to the Practice, Pleading, and Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery; with copious Notes, containing a Summary of every reported Decision thereon. By GEORGE OSBORNE MORGAN, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Third Edition, considerably enlarged. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. Price 28s.

"Mr. Morgan's work merits the highest commendation for its usefulness, simplicity, and completeness. . . . . The practitioner will find in the pages of this book ample and at the same time terse and business-like information upon almost all the questions that arise in the ordinary proceedings in Chancery."—LAW MAGAZINE, Nov. 1862.

"No labour has been spared to make the work as complete and accurate as possible. With its elaborate index and marginal references, it is impossible to over-estimate its value as a manual of general practice."—LAW MAGAZINE, May, 1862.

"As to the particular merits of Mr. Morgan's book, we have already on former occasions expressed ourselves so fully that it is needless for us now to add anything further. We need only say that the new edition exhibits the same industry in the collection of cases, and the same accuracy in shortly expressing the points decided, as characterised the two former editions; and in reference to the distinction to which we have alluded, although Mr. Morgan retains the title and general scheme of his original work, he has made numerous additions connecting it with the earlier practice of the Court, which greatly increase its value as a general guide to Chancery procedure."—Solicitors' Journal, April 19th, 1862.

Pulling's Law of Attorneys, Notaries, &c. 1862.

A Summary of the Law and Practice Relating to Attorneys, General and Special, Attorneys-at-Law, Solicitors, Notaries, Proctors, Conveyancers, Scriveners Land Agents, House Agents, &c., and the Offices and Appointments usually held by them. Their several Qualifications and legitimate Province, Rights, Duties, Privileges, Exemptions, Disabilities, and Liabilities in the general Practice of the Law, in Legal Proceedings, in Legal Negotiations, and Legal Formalities. And the Law of Costs as between Party and Party and Attorney and Client. By ALEXANDER PULLING, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Third Edition. In 8vo. 1862. Price 18s. cloth.

"He has industriously collected a considerable number of cases interesting to solicitors which are not to be found collected in any other work, and his book contains a great deal of miscellaneous information which cannot be found elsewhere."—Solicitors' Journal.

"This is somewhat more than a new edition: it is a new work. Mr. Pulling has reconstructed the entire of his treatise on a new and much more convenient plan, introducing many subjects not before touched upon, and re-writing those parts which had been modified by recent legislation and decisions. It is a laborious work, a careful work, the work of a lawyer, and, beyond comparison, the best that has ever been produced upon its subject. Indeed, it is now the only book on the Law of the Profession that could be read or referred to with confidence, for it is the only one that has appeared since the great and valuable changes made by the recent statute. Two editions had already attested in the most unquestionable form the approval with which the Profession has received this work, and if the solicitors have been so well pleased with the former editions, they cannot but be still more satisfied with this one."—Law Times, April 12th, 1862.

* Smith's (Josiah W.) Compendium of the Law of Real and Personal Property.

Connected with CONVEYANCING, designed as a comprehensive and concise Text-book for Students and Practitioners. By JOSIAH WILLIAM SMITH, B.C.L., Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel. Second Edition. In 1 thick vol. 8vo. 1859. Price £1 10s. cloth.

 In this Edition are incorporated the principal points in a course of Lectures before the Incorporated Law Society.

NOTICES OF THE FIRST EDITION.

"We must say that he has performed the task of selecting and arranging with discretion and ability. . . . The book, if used in the manner recommended by the editor, as a refresher to the memory, and a repository of information that is wanted in daily practice, will be found of great value."—Jurist, 5th April, 1856.

"It will be seen from this outline that the work is extremely well planned; the topics are arranged in the natural order as they flow out of one another, and thus immensely aid the reader's memory. He writes like a man who is master of his theme, clearly and concisely."—Law Times, Dec. 1st, 1855.

"Of the manner in which Mr. Smith has acquitted himself of the task of supplying the deficiency he points out, we have great satisfaction in being able to speak in terms of the highest praise. The work before us has evidently been compiled with the most conscientious care; we have taken some trouble to test its contents, and can vouch for its merits in point of scrupulous accuracy."—The Examination of Articled Clerks, February, 1856.

* Smith's (Josiah W.) Manual of Equity Jurisprudence. 1864.

A Manual of Equity Jurisprudence, founded on "Story's Commentaries" and "Spence's Equitable Jurisdiction," and comprising in a small compass the Pointd of Equity usually occurring in Chancery and Conveyancing, and in the general Practice of a Solicitor. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel. Seventh Edition. In 12mo. 1864. Price 12s. cloth.

"The design and plan of all Mr. J. W. Smith's manuals are excellent. They are complete summaries of the several branches to which they relate. They give the marrow and pith without the mere modifications—principles and rules with some illustrations, but without attempting details. Works of this kind are of great value to a beginner; and when they also contain a careful selection of the most modern decisions, which serve at once to illustrate the propositions contained in the text, and to supply a repertory of the case law referring to them severally—as this work does in a very complete manner—they are quite as useful to persons engaged in actual practice."—Solicitors' Journal, January 2nd, 1864.

"To sum up all in a word, for the use both of the student and of the jurisconsult, the manual is the nearest approach to an Equity Code that the present literature of the law is able to furnish."—Law Times, January 16th, 1864.

Smith's (Josiah W.) Manual of Common Law and Bankruptcy.

A Manual of Common Law and Bankruptcy, founded on various Text-books and recent Statutes, and designed as a Companion to Smith's Manual of Equity. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., one of Her Majesty's Counsel; Editor of Mitford's "Chancery Pleadings," and Fearne's "Contingent Remainders;" Author of "A Compendium of the Law of Real and Personal Property," and "A Manual of Equity;" and one of the Consolidators of the Chancery Orders. In 1 vol. 12mo. 1862. Price 11s. 6d. cloth.

"The 'Manual of Common Law and Bankruptcy' is peculiarly suitable for the careful study of law students. . . . . Practising lawyers will find the book a valuable vade mecum."—Solicitors' Journal.

BOOKS OF COSTS.

Costs in Chancery.

Of Plaintiff and Defendant, together with the Statutes, Cases, and Orders relating thereto. By GEORGE OSBORNE MORGAN, and HORACE DAVEY, ESQRS., of Lincoln's Inn, Barristers-at-Law. (In the Press.)

Costs in the Common Law, Probate, and Divorce Courts.

BY E. W. LE RICHE.

In royal 12mo. Price 5s. cloth.

It may be stated, that most of the Bills have been drawn from such as have actually been taxed by the Masters; and, consequently, such supervision must insure advantages which Bills that have not been taxed (however well drawn) cannot possess.

Parliamentary Costs.

Relative to Private Bills, Election Petitions, and Appeal Causes; together with Allowances to Witnesses. By EDWARD WEBSTER, Esq., Clerk to the Taxing Officer of the House of Commons, and to the Examiners for Standing Orders. In 12mo. Price 5s. cloth.

"The object of this work is to give the scale of costs allowed to Solicitors in relation to private Bills before Parliament, the conduct of Election Petitions and Appeal Causes, and the Allowance to Witnesses. The connection of the author with the Taxing-office of the House of Commons, gives authority to the work, which has been compiled with some skill, and contains a very useful index, by which the costs allowed for attendances, time, drawing, copying, and perusing, in the several parliamentary proceedings, may be easily ascertained."—Solicitors' Journal, 15th October, 1859.

Scott's Costs in Common Law, Conveyancing, &c. 1860.

Bills of Costs in the Superior Courts of Common Law, the New Courts of Probate and Divorce, also in Parliament, the Crown Office, and the Queen's Remembrancer's Office, and in Bankruptcy, Insolvency, Conveyancing, Criminal Prosecutions on Circuit and at Sessions, &c., including Costs of Interlocutory Rules and Orders under the Common Law Procedure Acts, 1852 and 1854, and Bills of Exchange Act, 1855. By JOHN SCOTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. In royal 12mo. Price £1 cloth.

"Mr. Scott's work is well known to the profession. It is an extensive collection of taxed bills of costs in all branches of practice, supplied to him probably by the taxing masters. Such a work speaks for itself. Its obvious utility is its best recommendation."—Law Times, Oct. 13th, 1860.

"'Taxation of Costs'—In re Foster—Vice-Chancellor Wood said that Mr. Scott's book was a competent authority upon the subject."—Times, Dec. 13th, 1859.

Finlason's Common Law Acts, 1852, 1854, and 1860. Second Edition.

The Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852, 1854, and 1860, with Notes, and an Introduction. Second Edition. By W. F. FINLASON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. In 12mo. 1860. Price 10s. 6d. cloth.

"Mr. Finlason had previously edited the Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854. He has now completed his work by the addition of the Procedure Act of last session. To these he has subjoined useful notes of the cases decided upon them, and the rules and orders made in pursuance of them, and some forms required in practice. Although not a substitute for a formal treatise on the Practice of the Common Law, its compactness will make it a very useful little volume for the bag, to be carried into court for reference when questions arise upon those important statutes or the construction of them."—Law Times, Feb. 16th, 1861.

Greenwood's Manual of Conveyancing;

A Manual of the Practice of Conveyancing, showing the present Practice relating to the daily Routine of Conveyancing in Solicitors' Offices. To which are added Concise Common Forms and Precedents in Conveyancing;—Conditions of Sales, Conveyances, and all other Assurances in constant Use. By G. W. GREENWOOD. Second Edition, enlarged. In 12mo. Price 10s. 6d. cloth. 1858.

"The information under these heads is just of that ordinary practical kind which is learned from experience, and is not to be gathered from treatises.

"The work is well done, and will be very useful to the class for whom it is intended."—Jurist, May 3rd, 1856.

* Selwyn's Abridgment of the Law of Nisi Prius.

Twelfth Edition, with a Supplement, containing a Summary of the Law of Bankruptcy with reference to Questions that arise in Actions at Law as amended by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. By DAVID POWER, of the Middle Temple, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel, Recorder of Ipswich. In 2 vols. royal 8vo. 1859-61. Price £2 16s. cloth.

 The Supplement may be had separately, price 10s. 6d. cloth.

"We may be sure that a Law Book which passes through 'twelve editions' has been fully tested and generally approved of by the profession. The work before us comes with this high recommendation, and has well earned its title to a renewal of its term on the ground of public utility. It is a good sound work, well conceived and well arranged—a favourite alike with the law student and the advocate in full business. A judicious combination of old and modern law, of principles and practice, renders it very useful as a book to be carefully studied, as a work of reference in chambers, and as a circuit companion. It is far more readable than the works which bear a similar title, and, indeed, may rather be termed a Treatise upon Actions at Law, than a mere Nisi Prius book. We thank the learned editor for having given to the profession an excellent edition of this valuable work."—Jurist, June 4th, 1859.

* Archbold's Summary of the Law Relating to Pleadings and Evidence in Criminal Cases. 1862.

With the Statutes, Precedents of Indictments, &c.; the Practice relating to them, and the Evidence necessary to support them. By JOHN JERVIS, Esq. (late Lord Chief Justice of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas). Fifteenth Edition. By W. N. WELSBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Recorder of Chester. In royal 12mo. 1862. Price £1 6s. cloth.

* Greaves's Criminal Law Consolidation and Amendment Acts of the 24 & 25 Vict.—Second Edition.

With Notes, Observations, and Forms for Summary Proceedings. By CHARLES SPRENGEL GREAVES, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel, who prepared the Bills and attended the Select Committees of both Houses of Parliament, to which the Bills were referred. Second Edition. 1 vol. post 8vo. 1862. Price 16s. cloth.

"Among the many publications called into existence by the new criminal statutes, a book written by Mr. Greaves has of necessity pre-eminent claims on the attention of the public. . . . . When we add that Mr. Greaves has thoroughly performed the task he has imposed upon himself, our readers will be able to judge accurately as to the contents of the book, and to decide whether or not it is a book they desire to possess. It seems to us to meet the present want. . . . . No one is in a position to edit the new statutes after his proposed fashion more completely than Mr. Greaves, who, at all events, à priori, is more likely than others to give a full exposition of the alterations made in the law, and who most certainly must best know the objects with which they were made."—Jurist.

"There is certainly no lawyer living who is more competent than Mr. Greaves to edit these statutes, and that he has performed his task satisfactorily, is only what might have been fairly expected."—Solicitors' Journal.

* Arnould on Marine Insurance.

A Treatise on the Law of Marine Insurance and Average; with References to the American Cases and the later Continental Authorities. By Sir JOSEPH ARNOULD (Puisne Judge, Bombay). Second Edition. In 2 vols. royal 8vo. 1857. Price £2 16s. cloth.

"Mr. Arnould's Treatise on Marine Insurance is a text-book to which English Lawyers can point with much satisfaction. It is learned, it is accurate, it is instructive, and it handles law in a large and comprehensive manner. It has now reached a second edition, and its author has conscientiously exerted himself to bring his work down to the present state of the law both here and elsewhere."—Solicitors' Journal, Dec. 5th, 1857.

* Chancery Orders. (By Authority.)

The General Orders of the High Court of Chancery. Royal 8vo.

* Mitford on Pleading.

A Treatise on the Pleadings in Suits in the Court of Chancery, by English Bill. By JOHN MITFORD, Esq. (the late Lord Redesdale). The Fifth Edition, comprising a large body of Additional Notes, by JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., of Lincoln's Inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Editor of Fearne's Contingent Remainders, and Author of a Treatise on Executory Interests. In royal 8vo. Price 10s. boards.

"Mr. Smith is in every respect qualified to undertake the work before us. . . . . It was originally an admirable Treatise, and it is now enriched by every subsequent decision which can tend to illustrate old law, or explain the modifications to which it has been recently subjected."—Law Magazine, May, 1847.

"Good, wholesome, practical notes."—Jurist, June 19th, 1847.

Ebsworth's Law of Infants.

A Handy Book of the Law of Infants. By JOHN EBSWORTH, Esq., Solicitor. In 12mo. 1861. Price 3s. cloth.

Treating of—

I. Infants, their Parents and Guardians generally.
II. Rights and Liabilities of Infants, Criminaliter.
III. Infant Labourers.
IV. Apprentices.
V. Rights and Liabilities of Infants, Civiliter.

"Mr. Ebsworth's book is, therefore, likely to be very useful for reference in the first instance. It supplies a want which the voluminous and deeper works on the same subject appear to have only partially filled up.

"We recommend it as a book of first reference to all who desire information on the branch of law of which it treats."—Solicitors' Journal, June 8th, 1861.

Simon's Law relating to Railway Accidents.

Including an Outline of the Liabilities of Railway Companies as Carriers generally, concisely discussed and explained. By HENRY A. SIMON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. 12mo. Price 3s. cloth.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"This neat little handy-book contains four chapters.

" . . . . . it is very neatly done; it abounds in cases, and, small though it is, seems likely to be a useful vade mecum for those who may not equally desire to purchase a more expensive book."—Solicitors' Journal, Jan. 4th, 1862.

"Last of all is a full index, by which every particular in the work may be found at once. Throughout, there are ample references to larger works upon the several points of law relating to the questions occupying these pages; and altogether the reader will find that he has here an ample compendium of the legal rights and refuges of the public and the proprietors of railways, in their mutual relations."—Plymouth Journal.

Gough on the Land Registry and Declaration of Titles Acts. 1862.

The Acts to facilitate the Proof of Title to, and the Conveyance of Real Estates, and for Obtaining a Declaration of Title (25 & 26 Vict. cc. 53 and 67). Together with the General Orders, Table of Costs, and Forms for carrying the first-named Act into effect; also an Introduction, Practical Notes, and a full Index. By HENRY GOUGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. 1 vol. 12mo. Price 5s. 6d. cloth.

"After considering the various and manifold provisions of these Acts in general and detail, the Acts themselves are inserted 'in extenso,' with useful comparative references and notes, and the Rules, Orders, and Table of Fees and Commissions chargeable in the new office follow . . .

"The work concludes with a copious Index, and is written throughout with great care and perspicuity, and will, we have no doubt, prove an indispensable manual for the members of the legal profession and for all who are interested in the working of the new Acts and the new office."—Estates Gazette.

"Too much praise cannot be awarded to Mr. Gough for the great care and ability which distinguish his treatment of a difficult subject, and generally for the admirable manner in which he has brought his laborious task to a successful issue, and, in conclusion, we believe we may safely hazard the conjecture that its merits will shortly be fully appreciated by a multitude of studious readers."—Gazette of Bankruptcy.

Hanbury Jones on the Law of Uses.

A Treatise on the Law of Uses, mainly intended for Students. By W. HANBURY JONES, Esq. In 8vo. 1862. Price 7s. cloth.

"Time and space prevent us from attempting at present to give any idea of the solid learning, the sound reasoning, and the admirable ingenuity which this work displays. The name of the Author will be sufficient to indicate the qualities of the work."—Law Magazine, May, 1862.

New Nisi Prius Reports.

Reports of Cases decided at Nisi Prius and at the Crown side on Circuit, and select Decisions at Chambers. By T. CAMPBELL FOSTER, Esq., and W. F. FINLASON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barristers-at-Law. Vol. I. and Vol. II. Price £4 11s. 6d. 1859—61.

 The utility of Reports of the Decisions at Nisi Prius, and on the Crown side on Circuit, has been acknowledged from the time of Espinasse and Campbell to the present day, and yet in no other series of Reports have greater irregularities of publication existed. To remedy these defects, and to furnish a selection of Cases at once promptly reported and carefully chosen, are the inducements held out by the Publishers to the Profession for support.

Particular attention will be paid to points of Procedure, Practice and Evidence. Select Decisions at Chambers (especially in matters peculiarly or exclusively within that jurisdiction) will be added. Several of the Judges and many of the leading members of the Bar have kindly encouraged the undertaking, while the members of the Bar generally have rendered the most cordial co-operation in furnishing cases from their respective Circuits.

The annual expense will range from Twenty to Twenty-five shillings, and the Parts will appear about twice during the twelve months, and on each occasion will bring the Cases down to the point of publication.

Thring's (T.) Criminal Law of the Navy, 1861.

Comprising an Introductory Sketch of the Early State and Discipline of the Navy: the Naval Discipline Act of 1860, with Notes; Criminal Offences and their Punishment; the Constitution and Jurisdiction of Courts-Martial; the Forms of Procedure, and Law of Evidence applicable to Trials by Courts-Martial, with the New Regulations of the Admiralty, and a copious Index. By THEODORE THRING, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. In 12mo. Price 8s. 6d. cloth.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"Until very lately, the proceedings of courts-martial, especially those held in the cabin of a ship on the high seas, were a mystery to landsmen, and the contemptuous sobriquet of 'sea lawyer' has probably checked the curiosity of many a sailor about questions so nearly affecting his rights and liabilities. At last the Legislature has codified the Articles of War and general laws for the government of the Navy in a 'Naval Discipline Act,' which was first passed in 1860, but like so many of its predecessors, repealed and re-enacted with some modifications in 1861. Upon this latter statute, Mr. Thring's compact little work is a commentary. It is a complete manual of naval courts-martial, with a classification of offences punishable by naval and by common law respectively, a digest of the law of criminal evidence, an Appendix containing the Act itself and the Queen's regulations, a collection of forms, and a good index. We need not dwell on the value of such a text-book to the officers intrusted with the practical administration of this new code, the effect of which is to give naval courts-martial a concurrent jurisdiction as to such crimes as murder, theft, and forgery with the ordinary tribunals. No man ought to be his own lawyer in dealing with issues of life and death, and the Act, clear as it is, cannot supply the place of a familiarity with the practice of quarter sessions and assizes."—The Times, Dec. 19, 1861.

Braithwaite's Record and Writ Practice.

With Practical Directions and Observations. By T. W. BRAITHWAITE, of the Record and Writ Clerks' Office. In 8vo. 1858. Price 18s. cloth.

"There is quite enough of business connected with this office to justify the devotion to it of an entire volume, and the work could not have been committed to more competent hands. Mr. Braithwaite is officially master of the business, has access to the best sources of information, and possesses the methodical mind necessary to the construction of a good book of practice. It must become the book upon the limited but important subject of which it treats. . . . The practitioner, with this book before him, could scarcely make a mistake, for it tells him what he is to do, and that is the principal requirement and purpose of a book of practice."—Law Times, Feb. 6, 1858.

Thring's Land Drainage Act, 1861.

With an Introduction, Practical Notes, an Appendix of Statutes relating to Drainage, and Forms. By THEODORE THRING, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. 12mo. Price 7s. cloth.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"We have called the attention of our readers at some length to the provisions of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, because they are likely to be of considerable importance in actual practice; and it is desirable, particularly for country solicitors, that the machinery provided by the Act should be properly understood and widely appreciated. Mr. Thring has done his work very well, and there is not much chance of or room for any better edition of this statute than he has produced."—Solicitors' Journal, 18 Jan. 1862.

"Mr. Thring's edition of the Act is just that which was required; it is compact, with clear explanations in notes, and an introduction makes the work still more intelligible by a succinct history of the legislation on the subject, and by a masterly and well arranged analysis of the existing law. A collection of forms is given in an Appendix, and a good Index affords ready reference to any subject sought for. Mr. Thring has done good service to the landed interest by preparing for them this very useful hand-book of a law of which we trust they will extensively avail themselves."—Law Times, Feb. 1, 1862.

Millar and Collier's Bills of Sale.—Second Edition.

A Treatise on Bills of Sale, with an Appendix containing the Registration Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, and Precedents, &c. Second Edition. By F. C. J. MILLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. 1 vol. 12mo. 1860. Price 9s. cloth.

"The present treatise is an useful companion to the Act for the Registration of Bills of Sale, which was itself a boon to the mercantile community. The operation of the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, has tended to diminish the chances of fraud in these cases; but it still remains of the utmost consequence to the classes interested in this species of assurance that as much light as possible should be thrown on the variety of circumstances surrounding a Bill of Sale, both in regard to the cost and danger of the process, and its bearing on other branches of litigation, as, for instance, the Law of Bankruptcy, and the Law of Landlord and Tenant, with the provisions of which the grantor of the bill or the grantee, or both, may not impossibly happen in ignorance or otherwise to interfere. A manual like the volume before us, furnishing minute and exclusive information on these points, can hardly fail therefore to be welcome to the public."—Gazette of Bankruptcy.

Trevor on the Taxes on Succession.—Second Edition.

A Digest of the Statutes and Cases (including those of Scotland and Ireland) relating to the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties. With Practical Observations and Official Forms. Second Edition. By C. C. TREVOR, Esq. 12mo. 1860. 13s. cloth.

In the case of the "Attorney-General v. Abdy," 8 Jurist, N. S., 798, Baron Martin said—"I find that this view is taken in a book with which we agree, written by Mr. Trevor. We have had it in use in this Court ever since questions arose on the Succession Duty."

"It is a further recommendation of this volume, that the author has had in the revision of it the assistance of his father, so well known to the profession for thirty years, first as Solicitor, and afterwards as Comptroller of the Legacy Duties; so that the pages are stamped with a sort of authority."—Law Times, 21st June, 1856.

Woodfall's Law of Landlord and Tenant, 1863.

A Practical Treatise on the Law of Landlord and Tenant, with a full Collection of Precedents and Forms of Procedure. By S. B. HARRISON, Esq. Eighth Edition. By W. R. COLE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. In 1 thick vol. royal 8vo. Price 35s. cloth.

Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleadings, 1863.

Precedents of Pleadings in Actions in the Superior Courts of Common Law, with Notes. By EDWARD BULLEN, Esq., and STEPHEN MARTIN LEAKE, Esq., Barristers-at-law. Second Edition. 8vo. 1863. Price 26s. cloth.

Seton's Forms of Decrees in Equity,

And of Orders connected with them. A New Edition, adapted to the present practice, with practical Notes. By W. H. HARRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, and R. H. LEACH, Esq., one of the Registrars of the Court. Third Edition. 2 vols. Royal 8vo. 1862-3. Price £2 18s. cloth.

BOWYER'S COMMENTARIES.

Commentaries on Universal Public Law.

By SIR GEORGE BOWYER, Bart., M.P., D.C.L., Barrister-at-Law. In royal 8vo. 1854. Price 21s. cloth.

"Mr. Bowyer has laboriously won his reputation as a profound Civilian, a critical Canonist, and an industrious investigator of Foreign and European Law. His 'Commentaries on the British Constitution' have been translated or reprinted in every country where our Constitution is an object of study, and are received as the standard work upon this great topic. He has made accurate surveys of law in its separate departments; he now sits down to draw a general map of the whole. The result is a work wonderful in its erudition. The author's industry appears to have spread itself over every province of modern and ancient learning."—Morning Chronicle, April 15, 1854.

Commentaries on the Modern Civil Law.

Commentaries on the Modern Civil Law. By Sir G. BOWYER, Bart., M.P., D.C.L. In royal 8vo. 1848. Price 18s. cloth.

Commentaries on the Constitutional Law of England.

Commentaries on the Constitutional Law of England. By Sir G. BOWYER, Bart., M.P., D.C.L. Second Edition. In royal 8vo. 1846. Price £1 2s. cloth.

"We have now a full exposition of the machine of State in its working order. The work is now worthy of the very high position to which it aspires, that of being the standard work to which appeal shall be made upon all doubtful constitutional points. It was greatly wanted and has been well executed."—Atlas.

Spence on the Equitable Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.

Comprising Equitable Estates and Interests; their Nature, Qualities, and Incidents; in which is incorporated, so far as relates to those subjects, the substance of "Maddock's Principles of the Court of Chancery." By GEORGE SPENCE, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel. 2 vols. in royal 8vo. 1849. Price £3 13s. 6d. cloth.

"A mass of matter, cases, arguments, and discussions, thrown together in a work of such bulk, is like a library containing as many different works as this contains cases.

" . . . . presenting the authorities on each point in the ipsissima verba of judicial decisions; but connecting, modifying, approving or condemning them in his own words, which will be deservedly considered of little less weight by the student than the dicta to which they relate.

"Such is the variety of topics, subdivided into an almost infinite ramification of cases and points, into which the learned author is necessarily led;—few writers, we apprehend, could be found sufficiently persevering to pursue every topic in such a list with the same untiring vigour, till each in its turn was exhausted,—few would have the learning, fewer still the resolution."—Law Magazine, No. 22.

"A more dense mass of living law, available alike for study, reference, and practice, has seldom been presented to the Profession."—Jurist.

Littleton's Tenures.

Littleton's Tenures in English. A corrected Edition, handsomely printed in a very small pocket volume. 1845. Price 6s. boards.

MAGISTERIAL LAW.

Stone's Petty Sessions Practice. 1863.

With the Statutes, a List of Summary Convictions and an Appendix of Forms. Seventh Edition, with a Supplement incorporating the Changes made by the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts. By THOMAS BELL and LEWIS W. CAVE, of the Inner Temple, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law. 12mo. Price 18s. cloth.

 The Supplement may be had separately, price 3s. boards.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom therefore the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editors have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it."—Law Times.

Leeming and Cross' Quarter Sessions Practice.

The General and Quarter Sessions of the Peace: their Jurisdiction and Practice in other than Criminal Matters. By HENRY LEEMING and RICHARD ASSHETON CROSS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law. 8vo. 1858. Price 16s. cloth.

A Summary of the Duties of a Justice of the Peace out of Sessions. Summary Convictions.

By THOMAS JAMES ARNOLD, Esq., one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates. 8vo. 1860. Price £1 6s. cloth.

"Mr. Arnold, as a Police Magistrate, knows precisely what are the wants of magistrates, and with purpose to supply them he has compiled the volume before us.

"An excellent and very copious index is appended. Magistrates will find this volume greatly to aid them in the ready and correct performance of their responsible and onerous duties."—Law Times, No. 868.

BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE

AND PARISH OFFICER.

Thirtieth Edition,

IN FIVE VOLUMES, ENTIRELY RE-MODELLED, AND BROUGHT DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME.

UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF

W. N. WELSBY, Esq.,

BARRISTER-AT-LAW, RECORDER OF CHESTER:

ASSISTED BY

JAMES EDWARD DAVIS, of the Middle Temple, Esq.
CHARLES GEORGE MEREWETHER, of the Inner Temple, Esq.
CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, of the Inner Temple, Esq.
THOMAS SIRREL PRITCHARD, of the Inner Temple, Esq.
LEWIS W. CAVE, of the Inner Temple, Esq.
Barristers-at-Law.

The Publishers beg to state, that in consequence of the numerous and important changes in Magisterial and Parochial Law since the publication of the last edition of this work, this forthcoming edition will be entirely re-constructed and re-arranged; and, much superfluous matter being retrenched, the whole will be contained in five volumes. The names of the gentlemen who have undertaken to edit the work, under the superintendence of Mr. Welsby, will be a sufficient guarantee that it will become the most perfect Cyclopædia of Magisterial and Parochial Law hitherto offered to the Profession.
